The Development of Democracy

(By B. RALPH SUMMER)

"These United States are, and of right ought to be free and independent states." So stated the Declaration of Independence to the world in 1776. Previous to this time the colonies had in no sense been united. Fear, turmoil, and suffering held them together, during the years of the Revolution. Even during this distressing period, there were many occasions when the colonies failed to keep faith with the Union they had formed. As soon as their liberty had been won, the colonies began to think more of themselves as independent states than united colonies. As a result paper money came to have no value, business came to a stand-still, commerce stopped, Congress could not pay its interest on principal on the national debt, foreign powers began to disregard treaties and obligations promised by the government in the United States; rural people of our country were oppressed by taxes, homes being sold for payment of mortgages, and armed men all over the colonies were surrounding the courts and government bodies demanding relief. Such were the facts of our early government.

This nation of ours was faced with a crisis of imminent danger. It is a fact that when a nation is faced with dangers as stated, progress is made in government. So, the farsighted men in our colonies envisioned the possibilities of disaster. As a result the Constitutional Convention was called to meet in May 1787, at Philadelphia. Out of this storm and stress, chaos and suffering came our great Constitution.

Let me dwell on our makers of the Constitution for a few brief moments. To understand and appreciate fully our federal Constitution, one must know something of the character of the men who composed the Constitutional Convention. A great document can never come from men of small intellect or base motives.

Twenty-nine men out of the fifty-five members had been graduated from colleges and universities of America and Europe. It was an assurance that the intellectual calibre of the convention was of the first order.

By far the most prominent, as well as the greatest man at the convention, was George Washington—unselfish, patriotic to the core, modest and refined in his taste, noble in character, and "just" in his judgment. This convention would not have assembled had he not used his influence to have it called.

The most intriguing character in the convention was James Madison—small of stature but a giant in intellect. He had a profound knowledge of government. He had a clear vision of the kind of constitution needed.

The most eloquent man at the convention was Alexander Hamilton. He was brilliant and dashing; passionately interested in a new constitution but one who distrusted the masses and believed they were not able to govern themselves, so his views were too aristocratic and, therefore, influenced the convention not to adopt his plan.

His greatest work was influencing the states to accept the Constitution.

James Wilson, Robert Morris, and Franklin were among the strong men from Pennsylvania. These and many more were men of flesh and blood even as you and I. They had their strengths and their weaknesses. Take it all in all, we have not seen on the American soil another convention, congress, or legislative assembly its equal.

The Constitutional Convention was called to meet on May 14, 1787. But that was before horse and buggy days. The delegates had two choices of travel—to ride horseback or to travel by stage coach. Is there little wonder that a majority of the delegates failed to reach Philadelphia on the appointed day. These were the days when men were not in vulgar haste. There was time for leisure. Men had not acquired the habit of speeding across the continent on an express train, or racing over the highways in a streamlined automobile, or flying through the air. In fact, when they did arrive at Philadelphia they were in no great haste to rush the business through and get back home. They too, plenty of time to talk over the problems involved. Their actions were quite different from the way we respond today. They worked from May until September to produce this wonderful document of ours. These men saw that their convention was protected in every possible manner. No one was allowed to loiter near the hall. The cobblestone street in front action on this program. On a building constructed at a cost of $300,000.00, the cost to the district would be $185,000.00. The remaining amount of $115,000.00 would be received as an outright grant from P. W. A. The board is convinced that a program makes the temporary delay in starting construction so advantageous as to be practically imperative.

"Meanwhile the preparation of P. W. A. information forms is proceeding rapidly so as to protect the interests of the school district in the new program."

The 1939-40 budget adopted at the meeting calls for total receipts and expenditures of $413,650.00.

"Of this amount $300,000 covers the expected building program. The remaining $113,650 covers regular expenditures. It is about $2,000 above last year's regular budget. The difference is occasioned by more than $5,000 for rentals and approximately $7,000 for fire loss replacements of texts, supplies, apparatus, and similar items. The latter items are covered by insurance funds. To handle the rental proposition without an increase of taxes required the cutting of other expenses to the minimum."

Other matters considered by the board at Monday's meeting included a decision to inspect the present school buildings to determine what repairs will be necessary before fall and the granting of permission to the Undine Fire Company to hold boxing bouts in the gymnasium of the Spring street school in connection with the company's annual carnival later in the summer.

Mrs. Cyrus Gearhart has in her possession a letter written by the late E. C. Humes to Governor A. G. Curtin, dated Nov. 9, 1866, Bellefonte, Pa. This letter was written from the First National Bank. E. C. Humes was president and G. P. Harris was cashier.
