THOUGHTS UNSPOKEN

Often when something is splendidly done. Those who observe it rejoice. But hidden away. Aare words we should say. That few of us ever can voice.

Sometimes a trifle my neighbor enjoys. Lends me a share of his charm. Perhaps it's a whim. Quite important to him. A morsel of praise wouldn't harm. Maybe his smile would repay me well.

If only I'd learn to speak. Whenever he's blessed. Or by fortune caressed. With favors that all of us seek. Often the heart sings a bit of a tune. That somehow our lips deny. Often we thrill. Yet the tongue is still. And the bit of a tune must die. I'm rather convinced that a friendly sign. Convention forbids me to give. Would serve to convey. What my heart would say. And the melody there would live.
