

THE WAR IN EUROPE

What Are the Peace Terms?

With France uncertain whether the German Army is ready to launch a great offensive, Great Britain waiting for intensified aerial and submarine attacks and diplomats generally watching developments affecting neutral nations, we turn this week to the contemplation of peace which must eventually compel statements to work out the details of a "new order" in Europe, if not the world.

Although the war in Europe has hardly gotten underway, the attention of statesmen is already being directed to the task which will belong to the victor when the fighting ends and the nations involved attempt to restore order and to preserve peace for the future.

Anthony Eden, Dominion Secretary of the British Government, points out that his country must not only win the war but also the "after-war." The latter, he says, maybe the more difficult task because it will then be necessary to give practical expression to the innermost feelings of men and women in all lands where servitude has not starved or frozen them.

It is worth pointing out, in connection with this subject, that the Union of South Africa, which was secured by the British Army after a three-year campaign, is wholeheartedly behind the British Empire in the present struggle.

Every one recalls the case of General Smuts, who led the Boers in their struggle against the British and later lived to cooperate with his foes in the World War. More recently, he upset the Government of South Africa because it wished to be neutral in the present struggle.

An Earlier Example

In a recent broadcast, Colonel Denis Reitz, Minister for Native Affairs in the Union of South Africa, recalled that he fought Britain for three years in South Africa and went into exile rather than live under the Union Jack where peace was finally concluded. But, he points out, Britain, "after defeating us in war, treated us with a generosity unknown in history and conferred on us an even greater measure of liberty than we had enjoyed under our former employer. Continuing, he says, "Today, we are not only free, but also safer than we could hope to be if we were on our own with the smash and grab policy which is now trying to dominate the world."

German Aims Academic

The aims of a nation at war are important, only if the nation wins the war. A peace, dictated by Germany, would probably include conditions similar to those imposed upon the Czechs and the Poles. However, as most of us believe that Germany will not win this war, the war aims of that nation possess only an academic interest until events develop that make it probable that Hitler will be the victor.

No such observation can be applied to the British and French nations, which are generally considered the prospective winners of the war. Consequently, upon them devolves the duty of plainly stating their aims and objectives, with special attention to the organization of Europe after the guns cease their barking.

It may be a little early to expect that statements of Britain and France to announce, positively and conclusively, the aims and objectives of the present war. They have been stated in general terms, but the principles enunciated have not been applied to the particular conditions which will exist when the war ends. Just at present, with the belligerents anxiously courting the neutrals, it is almost impossible to declare any absolute program for Europe in peace.

War Cuts British Trade

While much is heard of the British blockade of Germany, which has practically removed German commerce from the high seas, the influence of the war upon British commerce has been overlooked.

Reports from London show that the first months of war have resulted in a reduction of foreign trade that amounts to nearly forty per cent. Imports are down by one-third and exports by about twenty per cent. While the British Government, in order to prevent information getting to the enemy, withholds details about its foreign trade, imports of grain and meat in September dropped sharply while imports of ores, scrap iron, cotton and silk, all useful in war, soared sharply.

If British foreign commerce dropped forty per cent. during the first month of the struggle, when British ships continued to ply the oceans one can imagine that German foreign commerce, except in the Baltic area, was practically extinguished. While military activity has been slight, there is no getting around the fact that the war has already played havoc with the commerce of the nations involved. Unless there is a decisive victory on the military front, the outcome of the war will depend upon the ability of the nations to carry on under the economic stringencies that the war entails.

If this is to be the decisive factor of the war, it can hardly be doubted that Great Britain and France are better able to endure than Germany.

ter the impact and stopped with the battered right side against the street sign on the extension of West Water street, while Haines' machine overturned on its right side on North Fairview street. As far as the police have been able to learn, there were no witnesses.

Serious as it was, the crash might have been more grave had it occurred a half hour later, when groups of children going to the Training School are using that crossing.

Dr. John G. Flowers, president of the college, told City Councilman W. Brown Elliott after the crash that the dump of evergreen trees which Mr. Haines said prevented him from seeing the Richey car would be transplanted to some other position on the campus.

The crash was so great that tools from the Richey car were found on the campus lawn as far away from the scene as 112 feet, according to measurements made by Chief Peters.

Evelyn Richey is employed at a chain store and her sister, Betty, lives at home with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Richey, Dunns-town, Lock Haven, R. D. V.

Miss Merrill is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Fred S. Merrill, of Clearfield.

Survivors of the dead youth include his parents and his sisters.

Expect no favors and you will retain your friends.

So it was that we felt slightly embarrassed and cowed when the toastmaster-with-few-duties got up and concluded the meeting. Only a reporter who has wrestled through hundreds of speeches at hundreds of dinners can appreciate the warm glow of gratitude that comes at such a time.

John Speck, under full sail, appeared in the Elk's Halloween parade here last Wednesday night and was overjoyed to tears when his outlandish woman's costume won a prize. He filtered into the Elks Home after the parade to claim the award. "What good will that do me?" John wailed when he learned he had won a permanent wave. Did you notice the music of the Wetzel Band of Milesburg? Under the leadership of George Sheckler the band is really going places, and if it improves in the next year as much as it has in the past few months, the famous State Championship Clearfield Legion Band had better look to its laurels.

SING IT, DAN

Western Union is advertising "Singing Telegrams," whereby you can send the old song "Happy Birthday To You," to friends anywhere as a surprise on their natal days. So don't be surprised if on answering the telephone some day you hear a deep bass voice giving the following program: "Good morning this is Western Union. I have a telegram for you." Cough and throat clearing, followed by a stentorian rendition of "Happy Birthday To You" and ending with "Signed, Jane." We're almost tempted to send one of the messages to yourself, just to hear Western Union agent Mac Hall in action.

Dr. J. W. Claudy, for the past number of years superintendent of Rockview penitentiary, saw his first electrocution on October 23, when Frank L. Wilson, of Pittsburgh, successor to the late Robert Elliott, officiated at the controls of the electric chair for the first time. The condemned man wanted spiritual counsel, and after the usual prison chaplain C. F. Lauer from performing his duties, Dr. Claudy, a former Presbyterian minister, volunteered his services. Monday, October 30, Dr. Claudy officiated in the same capacity for two other condemned men.

PET PEEVES

All of you are probably hounded by pet peeves—small things which are a source of almost constant irritation. Jesse Caum's pet is the large puddle of water which forms in front of the post office every time it rains. "It wouldn't be so bad if you could step over it," Jesse complained, "but it's so large you're forced to wade through it!" If any of you customers have a pet peeve you'd like to get off your mind, drop this department a card and we'll see what can be done about it.

Old-Time Hunting Adventures

part in the fall of 1888. He and a Mr. Zimmerman, a once famous hunter, went out to what he called the Scocoolac region, back of Beech Creek, a section of country that abounded with deer.

Mr. Zimmerman placed DeLong on a crossing where he remained a long time, but his partner, by mistake took a wrong direction and disappeared. DeLong got tired waiting and decided to make a still hunt back towards camp.

Coming down to a moor or meadow, surrounded by thick underbrush, he heard a disturbance. It sounded like something beating the earth with an occasional snort or bellow.

With gun ready for an emergency, he cautiously advanced through the underbrush, when a short distance before him he saw a large deer in the edge of the brush, moving backward and sideways, apparently struggling, with head lowered so that it was obscured by the high vegetation.

A well-aimed shot from his trusty old muzzle-loader sent a bear near to the animal's heart. It dropped, but a desperate struggle warned him to reload quickly, which he did. With knife in one hand and loaded rifle in the other he advanced.

Imagine his surprise when he discovered that the deer had crawled back about ten feet and was standing face-about, head still lowered, with large dangerous rack, as if ready to make a charge on him.

A second shot from his gun felled the large buck. Again he re-loaded and hearing no disturbance he rushed forward to claim his prize.

Imagine DeLong's surprise when lying before him were two monster, five-pronged bucks, dead as a door nail. Closer inspection revealed the fact that these animals, the pride of the forest, had met in deadly combat, and in the fierce struggle their huge antlers became entwined, locked like a vise, and the chances were they might have perished in their struggle.

Being some several miles from camp and late in the afternoon, DeLong set to work cleaning his game. But how to get his deer dressed and hung up, thus locked together, was another problem.

He acted at once by severing the heads from the bodies. Then he carried his deer one at a time towards camp, leaving the locked heads where they were killed. Night came on and finally he struck them on the saplings, and by 10 p. m. he reached the cabin just in time to partake of a warm meal and relate his adventure to his comrade.

Those were the only deer killed by them that trip, but the largest killed in that region for many years.
