If Hitler elects to prosecute the war on the basis outlined above. what happens along the Franco-German border will depend entirely upon Allied strategy. For the presat least, Great Britain and France are perfectly willing to forego the supreme test that an attack upon the Seigfried line would entail. They are, we presume, willing to continue the slow-motioned warfare until more soldiers can be trained for battle, greater war materials can be stored for use and aerial fleets can be vastly strengthened.

should be recognized that. It granting the possibility that Germany may be able to get along despite the blockade, the Allies cannot win the war by putting on a seige for ten or twenty years. The objective of the present struggle, from the viewpoint of Great Britain and France, is to remove the threat of military force from Europe. This means the defeat of Germany's armed forces because so long as they exist in their present, or strengthened condition, the threat to the peace of Europe will continue.
