THERE ARE SEVERAL TYPES OF COTER

The vast majority of goiters can be successfully cured, if steps are taken in time Generally speaking, there are two kinds of goiter—the "toxic" for poisonous) and the "non-toxic" From a medical standpoint, there are three types that occur most

> (1) The "colloid" type—symmetrical enlargement of the rhyroid gland where both sides of the neck are uniform, usually found in young girls, and usually passes away after adolescence is established (2) The "adenomatous" type—usually an uneven en-largement, more pronounced on one side and usually appears early in adult life The most common type and about 25% become "roxic", if not properly

(3) The "ex-opthalmic" type-characterized by the prominence of the eyes, or a "pop-eyed" appearance. The thyroid may or may not show enlargement, but this is the most "toxic" type and hardest with which The goiter is symptomized at first by a faster pulse, a change in the force of heart bear, increased appetite, with marked loss of weight, profuse perspiring and feeling too hot without apparent cause, with later symptoms of nervousness, sleep-lessness, and weariness, high blood pressure and a damaged

Goiter is difficult to diagnose and treat, and the goiter patient should see his doctor as early as symptoms appear then give his full co-operation to the treatment
