A "Crackerless" Fourth of July

of work required in turning out millions of these little explosives. One man, for instance, makes fuses, another cuts them in lengths and another sorts them in sizes. One man makes the paper, another rolls the crackers, while his neighbor fills the ends with clay.

The paper man would not do the clay man's work, any more than the fuse maker would do the sorter's work, and every little firecracker before it reaches America has in its construction passed through over sixty pairs of hands.

In fact, the Chinese turn out their firecrackers by the same method as our modern plants assemble automobiles.

The workrooms are long sheds with blue tile roofs. The laborers sit on little stools at long bench-like tables. As soon as one man finishes his part of the work he passes it on to his neighbor, the latter following his example when he has done his share, and thus it starts at the end of the table as a little paper and a fuse and comes out at the other end as a finished firecracker.

One of the rooms is devoted to braiding and wrapping the crackers, and another for packing them for shipment.

Of course there is a man who designs the grotesque labels for the packages. After the designs have been transferred to wooden blocks they go to the printing room where they are printed with hand presses. The Chinese don't want labor-saving machinery—they prefer to do everything by hand.

It is an easy thing to distinguish

the firecrackers made in America

from those of Chinese make. In the first place, American crackers are never small. They are rarely smaller than four and a half inches in length and have short cord fuses. While, on the other hand, the Chinese kind have paper fuses, are braided into packs and have gilt labels.

The large American firecrackers always have a notice printed on their side. Do not hold in the hand after lighting." Only an American boy would be guilty of such a reckless thing. In China, as soon as a child lights a firecracker he leaves it and does not run back and pick it up to see if the fuse is burned out.

But in America it is not so. The Glorious Fourth comes but once a year, and the small boy in the street desires to have a good time rushes about and does some of the most venturesome things. If he would follow the Chinese example the occultists and surgeons would not do such a thriving business the day following the celebration of independence.
