QUALITY EGGS ARE GOAL OF EXTENSION PROGRAM

Seeking to maintain and improve the quality of eggs put on the market by producers, the Agricultural Extension Service has consistently emphasized the importance of eight practices the poultryman can use.
County Agent R. C. Blaney explains that these practices are:
1. Maintain a temperature under 65 degrees in the egg cellar.
2. Maintain a relative humidity of 75 per cent in the egg cellar.

"DAMPING-OFF" CAUSES POOR LEGUME STANDS
Poor stands of legumes, often blamed on the seed, are more likely to be caused by seed-borne diseases, according to preliminary reports of studies conducted at the Northeastern Regional Pasture Laboratory at State College.
Seed treatment for such crops as cotton, wheat, and other small grains has been developed to control "damping-off" organisms which pass from the seed to the seedling.

Five different kinds of fungicides, including both 2 per cent and 5 per cent organic mercury, organic sulphur, zinc oxides, and cuprous oxide, were used in the treatments.
An average of 60 per cent of the treated seed germinated compared to about 28 per cent of the untreated seed.
Five per cent organic mercury produced greatest improvements, giving increased germination on 13 of the 18 different crops.
The treatment, however, kills no-nutritive bacteria used to inoculate legumes, making it necessary to apply the inoculating material to the soil rather than to the seed. While the work thus far is only experimental, it does prove that legumes suffer from seed-borne disease. With
