Under the direction of officials of the Bellefonte Garden Club, the shrubbery in the triangular traffic island on the Diamond was thinned out and "overhauled" Monday. Some of the arbor-vitae and juniper placed in the island several years ago had died, while other plants in the too-thick planted island had grown irregularly, giving the plot a somewhat abandoned appearance. The plants were thinned out, dead ones removed, and the irregularly formed plants were replaced. Living plants salvaged from the island were taken to the Sewage Disposal Plant property, north of town, where they were replanted. Later in the summer, when the results of the work, Monday, become apparent, it is expected that the traffic triangle will be much more attractive.

You men who have difficulty in sewing on a button or mending a small tear, should drop around at the new Bell Telephone Company building on North Allegheny street and watch a Philadelphia workman fit canvas covers around steam pipes in the boiler room. Taking a plain piece of eight-ounce canvas, he snips, fits and sews, and in a short time the canvas snugly and neatly surrounds the asbestos covering of the pipes. It sounds simple. But when you see how carefully the canvas is fitted around intricate "S" joints, around pipe supports and other obstructions, you may conclude that covering pipe is a trade all its own—and it is. The Philadelphia learned years ago to sew canvas in the Navy, but when it came to pipe covering he found that all he knew about it was how to thread the needle. In recent years there has been a growing tendency to cover heating pipes with canvas instead of brass bands or other forms of bands. Canvas, it has been found, is faster, more durable, and more durable than other methods. A pipe coverer, it was explained, is a combination of tailor, plasterer, sculptor and "monkey." He fits and sews canvas, plasters and "sculpts" joints and angles to remove un- desirable projections and smooth the work by a ladder or spreader, and fits a network of pipes far above the floor.
