Pioneer Fought Convoys

he showed her, with a mermaid on it, that an Irish privateer, named Moore had given him, when dying to deliver to his sweetheart, and Almada was eternally hunting for the dark beauty.

The wife of one of the old Scotch pioneers was fond of telling Mrs. Miller of a beautiful mermaid in Galloway whose favorite haunts were the banks of the Nith and Orr and the edge of the Solway sea, which adjoins the mouths of these rivers. The mermaid occasionally made friends with human beings of her own sex, giving them recipes for salves which cured many diseases mortal women were heir to but mermaids exempt. Though possessed of these gracious qualities, yet when a serious premeditated injury was offered her, she was immediately awakened to the same sure revenge as sent the "Bismark" to Davy Jones' locker.

A farm woman, of devout Calvinistic leanings, felt that something should be done to drive away this helpful yet heathenish spirit. A deep and beautiful pool formed the mouth of Dalbeatty Run, by the Orr water eddy, was a beloved residence of the mermaid.

As the old lady put it, "In the first come of the moon she would seat herself on a block of granite worn smooth, at the brink of the pool, comb her hair, admire herself in a piece of mirror, and deliver the prescriptions for her ointments to those whom she designed to take notice of.

The farm woman, in a frenzy of religious zeal, after neighbors gave her quotations of Pastor Knox's sermon on heathens, heaved the smooth rock into the bottom of the deep pool. Not only that, but she began gumping noxious weeds and barnyard filth into the pool until the stream was polluted, and the mermaid departed forever, putting a spell of misfortune on the woman and her family.

"The mermaid was treated like she do the trout today, by pollution of our streams," the old lady remarked.

During the years of Captain Almada's achievements, James Lick, Pennsylvania's first and greatest philanthropist, who gave California the Lick observatory, was operating as a privateer in Latin American wars of independence off the west coast of South America, according to elderly historians of his native Lebanon county. Strangely enough, the Lick family coat of arms is Andalusian, and James Lick's own appearance was decidedly Spanish.

TWO KILLED ON WAY TO LEGION SESSION

A station wagon in which six Legionnaires of McKean county were riding crashed into a pole on a curve on Route 220, five miles north of Bedford, early Sunday morning, killing two and injuring the others.

Fatally hurt were John J. O'Connor, 47, and Leo F. O'Connor, 46, both of Bradford.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

While it is entirely useless to attempt to predict events in connection with military activity during the remainder of 1941 it might not be a waste of time to survey the situation and take a look-see at the possibilities.

German success in capturing Crete undoubtedly paves the way for a serious effort to drive the British out of the eastern Mediterranean and will encourage the Nazis around the Mediterranean.

The lulls that follow successful offensive efforts cause some people to lose sight of the never-ceasing Battle of the Atlantic, where we are inclined to believe the Germans have had considerable success. Of course, the British losses have not crippled the fighting power of the empire but they have forced the people to accept great sacrifices.

Ship Losses Weaken British

The continuing loss of merchant shipping is a problem that becomes more serious as the cumulative effects of the sinkings force drastic restrictions on imports and compel the reduction of empire shipping services. The United States, it is evident, is taking steps to relieve British shipping of many duties in order to make additional shipping available for the North Atlantic.

The campaign of Germany against the ports and shipping of the British Isles has been a more pronounced success than was generally expected. It is a menace that will continue until the shipyards of this country produce the new ships that will meet the needs of the war. Every ship that goes down means the loss of valuable cargoes and there is a point where the failure of these supplies to reach England will amount to a catastrophe.

Anything Can Happen in 1941

Now that the present purpose of Germany seems to be directed against the life-line of the empire, through the Mediterranean, it may be well to consider the possibility that Hitler is hopeful that the British will divert a substantial portion of their defense strength to this area. It will mean additional weakening of the home defense forces in the British Isles.

Hitler's plans in 1941 may yet include an all-out assault upon the English coast, designed to conquer the British before American supplies can be produced much less delivered in great quantity. Steadily, the German Fuehrer has made progress in lining up the nations of Europe and even the President of the United States in his fireside chat, admitted that the Nazis "have the armed power... to occupy Spain and Portugal" and, maybe, the French territories in Africa.

In considering the course of the struggle from this time on it is necessary to calculate the possible course of Russia, France, Japan and the United States. Of these nations, our own is the only source of strength to the British. Japan is an active ally of Hitler, France is probably a secret ally and Russia is acting as if the Soviet were in the same class.

U. S. Action May Decide War

When we look to the future, we must not overlook these powers. The United States is a source of great future strength and if the British can hold their island fortress long enough, the immense material resources of this country will decide the war. Just the same, the contribution that Japan and France can make to the purposes of Hitler are by no means negligible.

Germany, it appears, is looking ahead to the great struggle that will decide the mastery of the oceans of the world. Admiral Raeder, of the German navy, says that "the final struggle will not be easy, for we have to defeat England's power at sea." Before the war began the commander of the Nazi navy declared that "all wars will be settled by sea power."

Germany is now supreme upon the continent of Europe. Her huge army and vast air corps make her the master of all lands, unchallenged by any force available against her. Yet even with this success, the German leaders press on for greater gains. The explanation is to be found in their realization that access to the oceans of the world must be secured, or the triumphs of the Nazi will come to nothing.

Sea Control Eludes Hitler

Hitler is today leading his people, not against any European nation, but toward the open seas, because the successful and permanent establishment of his regime requires access to the raw materials of the world. Control of the seas is necessary to Germany if she hopes to maintain her gains and the defeat of the British is a necessary preliminary to this goal.

It is a clouded picture that appears upon the Nazi blackboard. Great victories have led to a situation where the English stand between Hitler and his dream of world domination. Now, a new development makes it clear that if the British go down, another nation, youthful, vigorous and endowed with almost supernatural resources, is ready to stand guard on the high seas and, if necessary, accept the challenge of Hitlerism.

Recalls Kidnap Attempt

and the Americans started a quick retreat.

In feeling, one soldier seized an ash tray as a souvenir, and when the men made their way back to their units this bit of loot led to their discovery. Complaints were made to the state department that Holland's neutrality had been violated.

Finally the case reached Gen. John J. Pershing, commander-in-chief of the American armies. How he disposed of it was not revealed.
