—R. K. Owens of East Bishop street, Bellefonte electrical appliance dealer, reports that he's used the same Christmas tree for several years. The tree, an eight-foot blue spruce, originally was planted in a tub for use in the Owens store. Two years ago after serving its purpose at the store it was taken to the Owens home where it was decorated and served admirably as a Christmas tree. Afterwards it was moved into the back yard, the bottom was knocked out of the tub which held it and roots fastened themselves in the ground to nourish the tree during the summer. Just before Christmas, Owens dug up the tree, pushed the roots up the tub and again used it as a Christmas tree indoors. He expects to return it to the yard for the summer. The idea seems to be a sound one. Figuring that it requires about ten years' time to grow an average Christmas tree, it isn't difficult to realize the tremendous toll each Christmas takes from the forests of the land. If it required ten years to grow each one of the evergreens lining the curbs of Bellefonte's business district the loss represented in growing time through the destruction of trees is 1260 years, and Bellefonte is only one tiny town among the many thousands throughout the land! It might be well if we could devise some way to celebrate Christmas sanely, insofar as our forests are concerned.
