Training Vital To War Effort

the method is more workable and gets results.

There are four points, he said, to the new training program. The new workman is set at ease in the presence of the foreman or whoever is in charge of his training. Effort is made to discover what the workman knows about the job, and what his importance is. Then the operation is presented to him and the key points of how to do it are pointed out.

The next step is the trying out and testing. All of this is followed up to see that the workman is doing the work correctly and understands what is to be done. The friendly spirit inculcated and the practical teaching of how to do the work, together with its being carried out at first under the eyes of the experienced teacher, have resulted in the magnificent contributions that industry is making to the war-time production.

Need Vitamin A Daily For Healthy Bodies

Vitamin A, if included in generous amounts in the diet, may help to prevent accidents in case of blackouts, explains Miss Helen S. Butler, home economics extension representative of Centre County.

Vitamin A helps us to see better in a dim light, and night driving is easier when we have plenty of this vitamin in our diets.

Green and yellow colored foods are the best sources of vitamin A. The greener and thinner the leaf, the richer it is in Vitamin A. Some of the vitamin A rich foods are carrots, yellow squash, pumpkins, yellow turnips, apricots, yellow peaches, Swiss chard, kale, spinach, leaf lettuce, broccoli, peas, green string beans, tomatoes, butter, liver, egg yolk, and cod liver or halibut liver oil.

Children need vitamin A for growth and to build strong teeth. Children do not grow normally when their diets are lacking in this vitamin. A person who does not receive enough vitamin A from the foods he eats is more susceptible to infection, his hair becomes brittle and dry, and his skin becomes dry.

Vitamin A is not easily lost in storage or in cooking. Pasteurization of milk does not destroy vitamin A. If the diet contains more Vitamin A than the body needs, it is stored in the liver.

Vitamin A works best in cooperation with other vitamins. It is essential then that our diets include foods containing all the various vitamins, for only then can we expect to build and maintain healthy bodies.
