If the late General James A. Beaver, one of Bellefonte's three Governors, could come back to life and visit Bellefonte, he could very well claim to be one of the foundling father's of this community's present chool system. Addressing the graduating class at the Bellefonte High School just fifty years ago, Governor Beaver took what was then considered as something of a flight of fancy, and declared that in high school girls should be taught to cook and sew, and boys should be taught how to use common tools. He added that a well-equipped gymnasium and thorough instruction in music should be part of every school's curriculum Turn to the "Fifty Years Ago" column in this issue and read the review. It isn't hard to tell that the reporter who wrote it felt that the Governor was day-dreaming.
