LETTERS to the Editor

WHY, INDEED

Editor Centre Democrat: Why do soldier boys have to be rationed with gas? They sacrifice their lives and give up their normal life at home and still they are rationed with gas. I think it is a disgrace. For instance, just this weekend two boys from Pine Camp, N. Y., came home on a weekend pass. They hitch-hiked down Saturday expecting to go back on the bus Sunday afternoon. They had to go to Williamsport to catch their bus.

Someone had to drive them to Williamsport. Some of us didn't have gas enough or if we got gas it would use up our last unit for this month's gas. After studying about an hour we finally borrowed a boy's car who has to go to the army himself this week. The results were a fast trip to Williamsport and the boys still missed their bus by an hour and 15 minutes.

They had to start hitch-hiking back to camp just for the sake of a few gallons of gas. It certainly is not fair to our boys in the armed forces.

College Surveys Local Industries

Penn State has trained more than 30,000 men and women. Although the new series will tie in more closely with industrial needs for types of workers the training project will still retain its feature of flexibility.

"Local industries needing special types of workers will be able to indicate their needs through our surveys," Mr. Kennedy explained, "and we will in turn offer courses in Bellefonte which will train those workers. The program will offer either pre-employment or in-service training."

The Penn State district representative further explained that "in-service" training will more than likely be confined to workers already in war industries and will be in the nature of refresher courses. Pre-employment training is designed to train men and women now working in other fields but desiring work in war industries where there is likely to be a technical or skilled labor bottleneck.

Should the need prove great enough here, Penn State will offer its tuition-free engineering war training to the general public with classes probably getting under way within the coming month.
