No-Slicing Gives Better Bread

When Food Order No. 1 went into effect several weeks ago, the slicing of bread by bakeries was prohibited. What the public didn't realize is that the order also prohibited bakeries from cross-graining and double-wrapping. In other words, under the order the dough must be taken from the moulder and placed directly in baking pans instead of being twisted (twisting two lengths of dough together) or cross-grained (cutting up the dough for a single loaf into several sections and placing them side by side in the pan, instead of lengthwise).

The bread you get today, therefore, is a simpler product than the one we've been accustomed to. It is more like the bread that used to come from grandmother's oven, minus the frills and furbelows that the industry had to adopt in order to relieve the housewife of the task of slicing her own.

As a result, the no-slicing order and the prohibition of twisting and cross-graining have brought about some savings to the bakers, although according to reports the saving is more than offset by an increase in the ceiling price of flour. The customer benefits, however. In exchange for slicing his own bread he gets a more tasty and heavier loaf at no increase in price.

The order banning slicing and the other "extras," had a threefold purpose.

One was to keep the price of bread from advancing, which reportedly would have been necessary because of the increase in the ceiling price of flour.

Another was to conserve manpower. The twisting and cross-graining of bread required additional labor. It required more labor to wrap sliced loaves, and required manpower to keep the bakeries' slicing machines in operation. (Slicing knives, made of a high grade steel alloy, have remarkably short lives. At the Old-Tyme Bakery new knives were required every week.)

The other reason for the order was to conserve materials. Unsliced bread requires only one wrapper instead of two. The conservation of metals and machinery needed to keep the high speed slicing machines in operation will be a substantial contribution to the war effort.

And so, when your artistic senses are jarred by a badly mutilated slice of bread, you can find real comfort in the fact that it probably tastes better than you expect, and that by stringing along with amateur bread cutters you are making a definite contribution to the national effort to win the war.

Almost any problem can be solved on paper, if you have a good pencil and write about 1,000 words.

Somebody insists that the people be informed. Well, there's enough stuff printed to inform the world.

was sticking in Bunker No. 2 and trouble had been experienced earlier in the night with the coal not running down the chute in this bunker, Woomer stated that it appeared as though Yingling used the bar to loosen the coal and that he had been caught in the slide. Mr. Woomer said that five men were working at the time and that it was customary for them to go to the bunker in pairs.

The victim was hired as ashman at the plant on November 13. He had previously worked for the company at the Penelac mine which was abandoned some time ago.

The plant manufactures steam heat and electricity.

Mr. Yingling was a widower. He is survived by the following five children: George, Morrisdale, R. D.; Mrs. Edith Pontillo, Clearfield; Mrs. June Frank, Harrisburg; Theodore, Jr., United States Army; and Marie, at home.
