HEALTH AND BEAUTY

After Teeth Lose Their Nerves Before the days when novocaine came into general use in dentistry, the agony of drilling was so acute that the writer, while in the dentist's chair, was in the habit of gripping the arms and letting imagination have free rein.

She pictured the dentist in the popular role of his satanic majesty, giving his subjects a liberal sample of things that were to come. Sometimes she'd think regretfully of how much more realistically Dante could have painted the tortures of dentistry.

But more dentists being humane and sympathetic, formed the habit of killing the nerves in teeth that were especially bad. In fact, the crowns of the teeth were replaced by gold or porcelain. The recipients of these artificial crowns often rejoiced as with satisfaction they view in the dentist's mirror their beautiful new teeth.

In those days the killing of nerves in teeth was considered a most humane procedure. It saved so much pain. The only objection could still long enough to have the cavity properly prepared for a filling.

And there was another side to it. So many people just wouldn't go to the dentist often enough, and the cavities in their teeth were exposed and had to be destroyed. In fact, some of them died spontaneously.

It was really believed that a dead tooth was about as good as a live one. People did not remember that a dead tree will become full of bugs that prey upon it and ultimately destroy it. That's just what happened to dead teeth. Being dead in a human mouth the bugs and poison from them get into the blood stream and sometimes destroy the people that harbor them.

Now I am going to relate a very startling fact. "A culture was made from the extracted dead tooth of a patient suffering from gastric ulcer."

This was injected into rabbits that were later killed and examined. Everyone of the animals had developed gastric ulcers. This experiment was repeatedly performed and always with the same results.

Later on, the scrapings taken from dead teeth of patients suffering from Bright's disease, neuritis, some forms of arthritis, St. Vitus dance, anemia and heart disease were injected into healthy rabbits. A large proportion of them had developed diseases that were similar to those of the patients from whose mouths the dead roots were taken.

These experiments proved that while these bacteria seemed to be alive, yet they were not for they produced different diseases. Some attacked one organ and some another. The bacteria taken from kidney disease invariably produced a similar disease in the animal in whom they were injected. The same was true of other diseases.

Many of you will argue that the animals were given a large dose of infection and therefore died, while man receives daily such small doses from his dead teeth that he overcomes the infection. This question has been answered.

Under anesthesia the nerves of teeth have been removed from animals. Scrapings from dead human teeth were planted in those of the animals, after which they led normal lives for awhile. But after a time in most of the animals thus treated the diseases characteristic of the implanted infections developed.

The germs from dead teeth are carried in the blood stream from one part of the body to another. They settle in various organs and form colonies which begin to prey upon the body already weakened by daily doses of poison and germs from dead teeth.

The American dentists had the proud distinction of being called the best dentists in the world when something exploded with a bang.

In October, 1910, a celebrated surgeon, Sir William Hunter of London, delivered a lecture before the faculty of medicine at McGill University in Montreal. While expressing his admiration for the ingenuity and skill of dentists, he denounced in no uncertain terms the practice of building dental restorations on dead and infected teeth.

He condemned also the gold shell crown and the cemented-in bridge work of the period. He proclaimed that patients with such dentistry had septic mouths; that they eventually became sick patients. It was a scathing indictment of American dentistry.

An American dentist, W. D. Miller, had pointed out the same thing in 1892. He not only paid no attention to him, but Hunter's blast woke up the profession and sent them scurrying to their microscopes with roots of dead teeth for examinations.

To the surprise of the investigators the most virulent germs were found upon the roots of these defunct teeth after extraction. It was also discovered that when the scrapings from such roots were cultured that colonies of pernicious bacteria were found.

The presence of disease germs found on the roots of teeth with dead nerves led to the practice of taking X-ray pictures of such teeth. Even though the X-ray may not show infection, it is by no means conclusive proof that it may not be there. It is not generally known by the laity that the X-ray only shows the changes in the bone structures of the teeth. Infection goes on some times for several years before a sufficient amount of bone is destroyed to show in the picture.

"Well, perhaps after all," he said some doctors may say, "these germs on the roots of dead teeth do not hurt anyone." This question was answered by injecting the infection found on dead teeth into rabbits, guinea pigs and other small animals. Nearly all of them got sick and died. Those that were very hardy lived in spite of the infection, but they had no powers of resistance. When these infected animals were exposed to cold and wet, especially if they had not been fed properly, they became ill and died. These experiments were repeated again and again, always with the same results. Thus it was proved that some people could get along very well with their dead teeth as long as they kept up their resistance, but when that was broken down they usually became sick.

"I Wasted '8 by neglecting my cleaner"

My vacuum cleaner gave me fair warning, but I didn't know enough to heed it.

"When I ran it, I noticed an unusual amount of noise in the radio, and the cleaner itself seemed to be balky. I did nothing about it and one morning it suddenly stopped running.

"My electric Service Dealer told me that if I'd brought the cleaner in as soon as it sounded funny he could have made the repairs for about $4—and this would even have included a new bag. My actual bill was $12—so that my neglect cost me $8."

Such actual experiences told us by our customers, can well serve as a reminder to you to heed warnings given by your motor driven appliances. Your electric Service Dealer is busy with unavoidable repairs. He joins us in hoping you can avoid unnecessary repairs.
