A WEEK OF THE WAR

With three Allied columns driving forward to pin the Axis armies in North Africa on the shores of the Mediterranean, Secretary of War Stimson announced last week that the Tunisian battle apparently "is entering the final phase" but that the German and Italian forces at bay there will probably fight to the bitter end. The Secretary made his announcement three days after American troops rolled up a 15-mile advance with the capture of Mateur. A later forward drive by American troops increased the pressure on Bizerte by capturing the Djebel Chenit range of hills, the last high ground before the great naval base. To the south the British First Army captured the battle-scarred Djebel Bou Aoukaz, the last formidable barrier west of the plain leading to the capital of Tunisia. The northernmost column, made up of French forces, was reported to have driven to the plain lying northwest of Lake Bizerte. Following an unsuccessful raid on Darwin, the Japanese began a submarine campaign against Allied shipping east of Australia, General MacArthur's headquarters announced early last week. With the evident intention of cutting supply lines from the United States the Japanese underwater attack was launched "in some force," a communique revealed. The attack on Darwin was made by 51 enemy bombers and fighters. A spokesman for MacArthur's headquarters declared that outnumbered Spitfires, manned mostly by British and Australian veterans of the Battle of Britain, "inflicted far heavier damage to the enemy than they received themselves." This revelation came as General MacArthur's daily communique reported destruction of four Japanese aircraft in an attack on the Koeping airfield of Timor by long-range Allied fighters. The Navy announced that shortly after the complete occupation of Guadalcanal, American forces extended their grip on the southeastern Solomon Islands by occupying the Russell Islands, west of Guadalcanal.
