time. When the grand jury had completed its first day's work, William Connelly, the constable in charge, impressed by the court's direction to protect and guard that body, calmly led them to the new county prison and locked them in. After several hours in "durance vile," their shouts attracted attention and they were released. The next day Connelly was brought before the court for contempt of their dignity.

Before this first official session in Centre county at least 36 lawyers appeared. The opening of a court in a new and prospective rich portion of the district was the bait which attracted the fish. How they managed to cram the judges, a jury panel and all these lawyers into the old Dunlop parlors is left to our imaginations. At any rate, the little town must have been packed with these visitors. Another Bellefonte resident, James Dunlop, Jr., was added to the list of attorneys. He was the son of the man in whose home the court was sitting.

143 years ago, trying a case in court was much different than it is today. No digest of laws and cases were to be found, all precedent was to be discovered only in the English cases, of the few in this country of which some lawyer might have a note, and the attorneys could not carry many books in their saddlebags. Prayer and petition, plea and interpleader, were used continuously in every type of the case. The 36 lawyers, each of whom appears to have been "briefed" in the first case to be heard, one of slander, took several days over the trial, and, after all, the case was finally marked "settled."

In the fall sessions of 1802, Centre had its first murder trial. Dan Byers, a negro, had killed a man of his own race in a dispute over the murdered man's wife. Both were, of course, slaves. The case caused great excitement throughout the neighborhood and had a peculiar ending. Byers was duly convicted and hung, but the mob broke on the first test and the mob surrounding the scene demanded the negro's freedom. However, the sheriff got another rope and the man was properly hung. The prosecution was handled by the new deputy Attorney-General, John Miles, assisted by Jonathan Walker, and the defense was in the hands of David Irvine and Robert T. Stewart. Incidentally, it cost the county $214 to hang the slave. His owner, James Smith, of that portion of Bellefonte then called "Smithfield," was recompensed to that amount out of the county funds.

In the year 1803 occurred the first election suit after the erection of the new county. Before a session of the Supreme Court, in circuit, sitting in Lewisburg, with Justices Jasper Yeater and Hugh H. Brackenridge on the bench, Jonathan H. Walker represented Michael T. Simpson in Simpson's Lessee vs. Williams, et al.

This was the first of some two thousand election suits to be instituted in Centre county. For the first fifty years of our history these cases involved comparatively simple, basic questions, as will be shown in later comments. It was not until after the first half century had passed that the great questions relative to large blocks of surveys were brought before our courts.

Thomas Cooper was appointed president-judge of the district in 1804, and appeared first in Bellefonte at the November Sessions of that year. During these years the regular sessions of the court were held by the associate-judges, often in the absence of the president-judge, and consisted chiefly in the laying out of roads, granting new tavern licenses, hearing of constables' returns, and other like routine matters.

In 1804, two new names were added to our list of attorneys, those of Andrew Boggs and Thomas Burnside. Boggs was no relation to the family of our first settler of that

Mr. and Mrs. Hugh C. Dale and two daughters of Oxford, were recent visitors with Centre county relatives. The Dales are among the big dairy farmers in Chester county.

Miss Madeline Davis departed on Wednesday for Grand Rapids, Mich., to spend the winter with Mr. Albert Groendyk and two children. Chaplain Groendyk is somewhere in the South Pacific with the U. S. Navy.

Little Miss Nancy Corl was a pleasant dinner guest Thursday at the J. Foster Musser home on the Branch, while her mother, Mrs. Ann Corl and a carload of friends were on a Santa Claus hunt to Lewistown.

Miss Barbara Ulmer returned last week from a several weeks' visit with her fiancé, Pvt. Dale Koon in Riverside, Calif., who is stationed at Camp Hand. He is a son of Mr. and Mrs. George Koon of State College.

After two years of vacation off the farm, Harry Struble will again till the good earth after April 1, and will tenant the Piersal Bryan farm, Harris, and his wife formed for many years the large Glasgow-Snyder farm, one of the best in Centre county.

Mr. and Mrs. Milton Weiland of Stormtown, were visitors in town Sunday with former neighbors and friends.

The foundation is being laid for a large new straw shed to be added to the Ed Frank dairy barn. Contractor Ritter of Lewistown, has the contract.

The Adam Garner family were recent dinner guests at the Charles Gearhart home in Boalsburg.

name. His father, was a former associate-judge of Franklin county, and had moved with his family to Halfmoon Valley. Andrew Boggs, who had been a practicing member of the bar prior to his arrival in Centre county, had been employed by the Federal Government to prosecute the only alleged violation of the "Alien and Sedition Act" in this section, during the year 1798. The defendant, Thomas McCalmont, of lower Nittany Valley, escaped his prosecutors through the protection of his neighbors, who felt that criticism of the President and his acts was an inherent right of every American citizen. Burnside, who had been born in Centre county, Ireland grew to be a most powerful figure in the legal profession of our county, district and state, and much would be said of him in later portions of this sketch. Other "ad item" appearances occurred, but it was not until 1806 that the district had a judge who appeared regularly at each term of court in the county.

Walter Reed, of Northumberland, who followed Charles Huston to Bellefonte, was admitted here in 1805, but soon left for Philadelphia, where he died in 1809.

In the year 1806 the new courthouse was completed and in the following year Walker was appointed the president-judge of this district. The organizer of our first court session spent much of his time in Bellefonte and finally made his permanent residence here, occupying at first a house located just east of the present Bellefonte Trust Co. building. He was recognized as a great lawyer and a great judge and took much interest in local conditions. In 1818, he was appointed the first judge for the new United States Circuit court for the Western District of Pennsylvania, at which time he moved with his family to Pittsburgh. He died on a visit to his son Robert J. at Natchez, Mississippi, in 1824.

William Norris, who had already attained some prominence in the Millifin County bar, was admitted before Walker here in 1806. He spent eight years in practice in Bellefonte, and then moved out of the district, finally settling in Lancaster, where he had much success in his profession. The next member was John Johnson Jr., admitted in 1811, who practiced here but a short while, soon joining his father in a mercantile enterprise, and died in 1819. Joseph M. Pot, a Quaker, believed to have been a member of the Philadelphia bar, was admitted here in 1813. He practiced in Bellefonte for a decade or more, at the same time holding several state appointments, and succeeded Judge Huston in the vacancy of the "Lion" judge. Later, he returned to Philadelphia, withdrew from active practice, and died in 1845.

During these years Judge Walker tried some of our early ejectment suits, and there appears to be no case in which he was reversed, notwithstanding the fact that there was little precedent for some of his decisions.

In 1814 appeared one of the great names of this section in that of William W. Potter. His family was probably the wealthiest in the region at that time. A son of our first associate-judge a man of considerable culture and refinement, he was very popular in the profession, and did considerable business among the younger members of the bar. He attained quite a reputation as a smart practitioner in the best sense of the word.

In the following year John Blanchard arrived in Bellefonte. A graduate of Dartmouth, he was an earnest and conscientious student of the law, and proved an excellent and noteworthy addition to the membership. Both of these men became our representative in congress, Potter in 1837 and 1839 and Blanchard in 1845 and 1847, each being elected twice and each dying at the end of his second term.

Stephen D. Walker, a son of the judge, and George L. Potter, a younger brother of the congressman, were admitted in 1817. Walker moved to Pittsburgh with his father's family in the following year, and Potter soon moved to Danville, Pa. to continue his practice there, but died
