

Germans Pinned 2,000 Civilians in Monastery

(Continued from page one) Monday and the Allies had promised bombardment next morning, the captain and a sergeant, he pointed out the warning in the American leaflet and begged that something be done to prevent the slaughter of the civilians.

The captain said he would reply at 5 the next morning. That night Don Gregorio held a special mass. He offered a very long prayer of thanks to God for having saved the monastery so far and invoked His protection for the civilians.

"The next morning several hundred of us were pressing against the gate before dawn awaiting for the Germans to answer.

"The Germans had placed another machine gun before the gate. That was the only answer Don Gregorio ever got."

Pilots Unaware of Tragedy At 9:30 a. m. the first wave of Fortresses came over and began cascading destruction upon the ancient walls, some of them relics of the 15th century. The American pilots had no way of knowing the Nazis and that hundreds of helpless men, women and civilians, the abbot and his priests, were imprisoned inside the target.

Mario and his family scurried under the "royal entrance," a stout arch over the main gate. One bomb from the first wave shattered the dome of the abbey and exploded in the second basement where hundreds of Mario's neighbors had taken refuge.

The Germans fled their machine guns when the first salvo exploded. The panic-stricken refugees burst the gate and streamed down the hillside screaming. Before Mario's sister, Antonietta, 15, picked up her 3-year-old sister, Maria, and ran, she saw three priests lying dead in the courtyard and Don Gregorio "in extreme agony."

"I think perhaps he was dying," she said.

Mario and his group were 25 yards from the gate when the second salvo burst. The people scattered into caves, groveling in terror, and lay there screaming and moaning for two hours while wave upon wave of planes dropped their bombs with methodical precision.

When the last formation droned into the distance, the survivors crept down the mountain through the white dust of pulverized rocks. Mario's group found a couple of American mule skinner in the hills north of Cassino, who brought them to safety.

Neither Mario nor any of the survivors with whom I talked later had any word of criticism of the Allies for making the attack. For the Germans had nothing but curses.

Hundreds Fled to Monastery

Mario and his family had been in the monastery for 15 days. They said hundreds of residents of the Cassino area trudged up the mountain to the monastery, believing that once they were inside the "neutral zone" they would be safe from war's horror.

They found only Don Gregorio and three or four priests still at the abbey when they arrived. There was sufficient drinking water, but the food was a little ground corn and flour which the refugees brought from Cassino.

The Germans permitted civilians to enter, but once the gate closed on them they were prisoners, survivors said. One man who tried to leave was shot, Mario said.

Those who reached freedom with Mario included his 18-year-old wife, his sisters, Antonietta, 15 and Maria, 3; Filomena, a white-haired woman about 50; Catherina, 54, and her daughter, Anna, 14, and son, Elio, 15.

Filomena wailed continuously for the loss of her husband and four children inside the monastery. Catherina also wept for her lost husband. None of them had washed for three days and they were half-starved. The children begged for food as we talked.
