Ime for a few more then," said Tom, and both again made tracks for the saloon. Coming back to the station, they learned they had also missed that train and there'd be another at 10 P. m. "Back we go," said Tom, and they staggered back to the bar across Reeling back to the station for the third time, they were told by the porter on the platform that the 10 o'clock train for the East had just "You'd better stay here and wait for the midnight," the porter advised. "That's the last train until 9 in the morning."

"Oh, we'll make that one O. K.," stuttered Tom, "We'll be back in plenty of time. Let's go, Bill. Guess we can hold a few more. So off they rolled to the saloon. Coming back to the station for the last time, they reached the platform just as the train was pulling out. Both started lumbering after it and just as the train picked up speed Bill managed to grab hold of the step handle and pull himself aboard. Back Seat Driver The policeman approached a car from which he could hear some of the fanciest cussing he ever laid ear to.

"What's the matter in there? What's goin' on?" The slightly woozy motorist looked up with eyes only half opened. "Some dirty so and so stole my steering wheel." "Now, just a minute, just a minute," said the cop. "You just quiet down and get up here in the front seat where you belong."

. . . A Tragic End This is the story of Johnny McGuire, Who ran through the streets with his trousers on fire. He went to the doctor's and fainted with fright

That's all, folks. What do you tell your son when he asks you what did moths live on before Eve invented clothes?

When the doctor told him his end was in sight.
