Clear-Cut Views on Public Life—1844 Harper's Magazine in a recent issue published an item entitled "Thoughts for a Campaign Year," written in the eighteen-forties. The article, the magazine explained, was found in a recently-discovered volume of the diary of George Mifflin Dallas, 1792-1864, who served as Mayor of Philadelphia; U. S. Senator; Secretary of War; and Vice President of the United States. He was the man for whom Dallas, Tex., was named. He wrote these "Deductions from Public Life," after presiding over the Senate, 1845-49. 1. There is no such thing as greatness. 2. Public men have flatterers and abusers, but neither friends nor enemies. 3. Lying is inseparable from Oratory. 4. None of the great qualities are necessary to make successful public men; a combination of the minor ones is far more certain. Truth, Courage, Candor, Wisdom, Firmness, Honor, and Religion may, by accident, now and then, be serviceable; but a steady perseverance in them leads inevitably to private life. 5. Some public men affect mutual repugnance, in order to conceal their devotion to each other. Each one knows that he is endangered by the dislike in which his secret friend is held. Sincerity is, perhaps, the only virtue which public men cannot under any circumstances practice. 7. It is a singular fact, that although everybody knows that American public life is full of annoyance and leads almost inevitably to poverty and repentance, yet nobody believes you when you disclaim a wish to enter it, or express satisfaction in getting out of it. The thought always is, "The grapes are sour." Home Damaged By Explosion (Continued from page One) of the furnace was blown off and dust from the coal was showered on the furniture and on the ceilings of the home.
