Personal Problems of Post-War Period

Twenty-two million men and women, almost half the 1940 peacetime work force, will be directly involved in a gigantic reshuffling of the nation's manpower during the transition from war to peace. Management and labor must start immediately to study and plan the solution of four major problems in this connection, if our human resources are to be protected and business is to make a quick transition to high level postwar employment. These are the conclusions reached by Charles A. Myers, assistant professor of Industrial Relations in Massachusetts Institute of Technology in a study on "Personnel Problems of the Postwar Transition Period" released today by the Committee for Economic Development. The publication is part of a larger study on Manpower Demobilization and Reemployment for the C. E. D. Research Committee of which Ralph E. Flinders is chairman. Myers points out the four situations for which businessmen must immediately map out policies, are: (1) The rehiring of servicemen; (2) Personnel transfers within plants; (3) Unavoidable layoffs, and (4) The hiring of new employees. Rehiring of servicemen will be a major problem not only because of legal rights of members of the armed forces, but also because of the moral obligation to provide jobs for as many of these workers as can be hired, Myers declares. Among the questions to be decided between management and labor in rehiring veterans are whether seniority accumulates while men are in the armed forces, whether jobs formerly held by servicemen and now reengineered to be done by women will be restored to provide jobs for servicemen, whether present jobs will be studied to create new openings for veterans and whether they will be given a chance to use new skills acquired while in service in fitting them for better peacetime jobs. Personnel Transfers Within Plants A clearcut seniority policy will be crucial in the fair handling of transfer and necessary downgrading of workers within plants or companies, the report states. An important point to agree upon will be the definition of a "seniority unit" whether it will be company-wide or will apply to one department or occupation. Strict application of seniority in a limited sense will bring about "intolerable situations," Myers said. Laying Off Workers Likewise strict seniority will not be applied in the laying off of workers, the report points out. Recognizing this, some union contracts permit consideration of family status and residence in making layoffs. On this point the author urges: "If management in unionized firms wants to give these factors considerable weight, particularly in the initial layoffs, it should pose the question to the union now."

Modern Etiquette

1. What would be considered the very first requisite for a man to observe in dress, in order to make a good appearance? 2. If a person is a friend of a bridegroom, but is not acquainted with the bride, to whom should the wedding gift be sent? 3. Is it all right to use red ink for writing social correspondence? 4. If a divorced man and woman are still friendly, would it be all right for the woman to invite her former husband to her second wedding? 5. Is it proper to send Christmas cards to persons with whom one is not personally acquainted? 6. How long a time should the bread and butter plates remain on the table? 7. If a guest makes a blunder at the table, is it necessary that the hostess do the same thing in order to put the guest at ease? 8. If a formal wedding is to take place, is it necessary that the full name be engraved on a visiting card? 9. Should a girl write notes of thanks for bridal shower gifts that are sent to her, or is this only necessary for wedding gifts? 10. When eating cherries or grapes at the table, what is the correct way to remove the stones from the mouth? 11. Does it show good manners to send social invitations by telegraph?

Answers

1. Neatness. If a man's clothes are free of dust and neatly pressed, with shoes shined and clean shirt and collar, he will make a better appearance than somebody who has expensive clothes but is slovenly. 2. The wedding gift should be addressed to the bride if received before the wedding; to the husband and wife after the wedding. 3. No; black or a very dark blue ink should be used for this purpose. 4. No, it would not only be tactless to do so, but would be sure to cause much unpleasant comment. 5. It is considered good form to send Christmas greetings to public personages that one admires. 6. Until the dessert is served. 7. No; the hostess should ignore the blunder and pretend that she doesn't see it. 8. A cutaway coat, with striped trousers. 9. Yes; avoid using initials. 10. Yes, she must thank the donor of any gift. If she didn't it would show lack of appreciation. 11. Remove the stone with the points of the fingers and place it on the plate. 12. Yes.
