WHERE BEAUTY REIGNS.

The entertainment last evening at Carnegie Library was a fitting climax to what might apopriately be called Carnegie week.

The one theme of conversation during the week was the Carnegie Library. The people have been full of the library, and the library has been full of the people from the time the ponderous doors were opened the early part of the week. Tuesday, Wednesday early part of the week. Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday the art gallery and the enjoyable organ recitals attracted the people at large, and on Friday the ladies interested in the Allegheny General Hospital took possession of the building, and it became a veritable fairyland. The Rainbow supper room was suggestive of a genuine rainbow from the exquisite harmonizing of colors with which the various tables were decorated. The doll room, lemon room and fancy department were all equally attractive, but the music hall at 8 o'clock received the thrones of handsomely attired ladies and gen-but the music hall at 8 o'clock received the throngs of handsomely attired ladies and gentlemen, thus making the rest of the building look like a deserted palace.

The programme for the evening was a delightful one, and the fancy dances by the tiny belies was a special feature. The petite dancers were lovely in face and form, and their gowning was simply beautiful, while they were all granefulness personified in their movements.

As the society editress of this paper was enjoying the pretty sight presented by the aggre-gation of youthful loveliness, visions of future conquests for the little beauties floated through her mind. Not long hence and all the bewitchner mind. Not long hence and all the bewitch-ing little creatures will have attained the age and accompilishments necessary to make their debuts into the social world. And when that time arrives Patisburg will rival any city in the United States in social life. Buds and belles will reign over hearts and households. It is will reign over hearts and households. It is inevitable unless some miracle transforms the charmingly facinating little creatures into ordinary, unprepossessing little mortals, which is highly improbable, that the newspapers will be swamped with society news, and the untir-ing efforts of two reporters will be necessary to keep the public informed of the doings of so many bright, vivacious society girls.

That looking forward is a digression, however. To return to the subject, the entertain ment was continued yesterday. The afternoon and evening was devoted to the sale of fancy articles and the serving of refreshments and supper, while the music hall, at 80 clock, seated s fashionable audience to listen to a musical programme that for quality has rarely been excelled in either city,

A thoroughly appreciated pleasure was the performance of Fraulein Aus der Ohe, Her selections were Tarantolie di Bravura and a Nocturne by Liszt; Rigaudon, by Raff; Dance of the Gnomes, by Liszt, and "An Episodic Thought," Weber-Henselt.

Among those who have delved in the fascinating study of legend, especially such as adorn German literature, many will doubtless feel interest in the presentation of "Gretchen," W. S. Gilbert's modern paraphrase of the mythical story, "Faust," in which Margaret Mather and her company appear at the Bijon Monday night. The idea of a modern "Faust" has sug-gested itself to numerous writers from Moeller to Beynolds, but none of these masters of the pen summoned up courage enough to make a bid for glory by breaking away from the traditional and immortal fame into which the genius of Marlowe and Goethe had molded the moving old German legend, before the advent of W. S. Gilbert. Gilbert was then under 30 years of age. Young men with Gilbert's push are usually innovators, and Gilbert was one of the most vehement representatives of this class. To a mind se fertile in resources as his the idea of an adaptation of "Faust," thoroughly mod-ernized and changed to give scope to originality, was a matter as easy of accomplishment as any ordinary test of the playwright. Discarding at once the clothing in which Goethe had wrapped his characters, but yet retaining the central ideas and motives, he commenced skillfully to weave a superstructure about the elemental fires that had given life to the old story, and the recital of which has brought tears to generations of people. The weird old legend lent itself to the change with grace and with all the brilliancy characteristic of Gilbert.

Gilbert was yet a young man when "Gretchen" was written, and the verse throughout the libretto shows rugged strength. This play has been termed his greatest, but it is doubtful if the essence of Goethe dramatization does not revert to the credit of the playmonth.

The new treatment brings into prominence the church, and Faustus is d scovered immured in the solemn recesses of a manastery, to which a surfeit of the things of the world and the love of women have driven him. As a Dominican father the apparently repentant man remains father the apparently repentant man remains an inmate of the cloister; but there are indications that the life and the man are not in sympathy. Founts, in a fit of delirium, dwells on worldly things, and his attendant fathers get from his ravings evidences of discontent.

When charged with inconstant thoughts Faustus denies his accusers, but to a friend—Gottfried—who meets him in the churchyard, he reveals the desire to live again. Gottfried is a warrior, and loves a maiden, Gretchen, whom he describes to Faustus. No longer wedded to the church by thought. Faustus conceived a strong scribes to Faustus. No longer wedded to the church by thought, Faustus conceived a strong desire to see a woman such as Gottfried paints, and in a burst of longing for the world, invokes the powers of earth, heaven, hell to end his torment and give him the boon he asks. At the first word of invocation, Mephisto, in a garb best calculated to deceive, confronts the doubting father and teaches the philosophy of which he is the incarnation. By the power of his art, Mephisto causes to

By the power of his art, Mephisto causes to appear before Fussius the image of Greichen, who passes as a ray of light among the tombs, and, pausing before the trembling priest, stretches out her arm, as though in dreamy supplication, then bows her head and disappears. Faustus, overcome by the beauty of the apparition, starts forward:

Spirit of peace-divine embodyment -Henceforth be thou my faith, be thou my church. Henceforth be thou my faith, be thou my church.

Again, dressed in the garb of a citizen, discarding entirely his priestly garments, the misguided man finds his way, under the spell of Mephasio, to a cottage in the village in which dwells the maid. Before he gets a sight of her, however, Gottfried arrives, sees Faustus, and agrees to introduce him to to the girl of whom he has spoken. The introduction takes place, and Greichen is placed under Faustus guardianship by Gottfried, who then leaves for the seat of war. After this the play keeps close to the old lines.

The talk of new theaters was not ended by Mr. Harry Williams' announcement of his in-tention to build one. Mr. Edward Jackman, who has just returned from New York, is still sanguine about the transformation of his build-ing into a theater. He still thinks that some-one will be found to give Pittsburg a new thea-ter by September next.

Mr. Harry Scott, the unmistakably enter prising manager of the World's Museum in Allegheny, said yesterday: "On Friday last I made application to the Building Inspector and Ordinance Officer for permission to erect on the vacant space adjoining the end of the mu-seum on River avenue an Eiffel Tower, which, when completed, will be 300 feet high, with two hydraulic elevators. My idea is to make it the hydranic elevators. My idea is to make it the highest point in the center of town, where a reasonable view of the city can be seen to advantage, and in summer an hour of pure, refreshing river valley air can be obtained and enjoyed. The tower will have a base of 75 feet square, while the top will have a base of 75 feet square, while the top will have 40 square feet. Light refreshments will be served at the top, and passengers will be charged by the hour. Only a limited number will be allowed on it at any one time."

The idea seems to be a good one, and should The idea seems to be a good one, and should be profitable to Mr. Scott.

The performance of "The Henrietta" at the Grand Opera House this week has been very acceptable to most people. It seems to be generally conceded, however, that Mr. Mordaunt's crally conceded, however, that Mr. Mordaunt's conception of Nick Vanalstyne is hardly so in harmony with the character as drawn by Bronson Howard as was Mr. Crane's. There is, as was pointed out in The Disparch last Tuesday, a warmheartedness about old Nick as Mr. Crane playshim, which Mr. Mordaunt does not grasp. Yet Mr. Mordaunt's was a very fine piece of acting, and Mr. Robson is to be congratulated on his good fortune in securing such a colleague.

The Programme.

THE return of Margaret Mather for a season of Shakespearean revivals recalls with renewed force the many rumors that have been circulating regarding het during the past fortnight Perhaps no American actress of her years has shared in a like degree the popularity and commendable success that has been so characteristic of her career. There must be something meteoric in the composition of this tragedlenne, for she does not seem con tent with those slow .processes out of which emerge the artistic training; for since her debut in Chicago, her course toward success has been marked by remarkable evidence of rapid and spentaneous growth. She came into the Temple of Thespis with meteoric suddenness. She conquered by the might of rugged genius, un-harnessed and untaught. Her first appearance harnessed and untaught. Her first appearance was marked by as remarkable an ovation as ever attended the debut of an American. This brilliancy and meteoric quality has flashed again during the past week, and something may be expected—unusual and unique—for Margaret Mather next season becomes her own manager and gives as an earnest of her intentions the announcement that she will present complete in all its parts a Parisian production of "Jeanne d'Arc," or "Joan of Arc," in the English acceptation. This move on the part of so enterprising and wide-awake a person as Miss Mather was not unlooked for. In one way or another this sail-same actress has suffered severely at the hands of managers, and the precedent which Langtry established was sufficient to demonstrate the capability of a female manager. The announcements that have been made during the forminght seem like a voice from the dead, for two years of silence has left the name of Margaret Mather only a histrionic remembrance. Her intention to take the reins in her own hands and push herself again before the public gaze and into the public sympathy is a move in the right direction and can but result to her great good. During the present energyment with present her investment two plays, in which she has never before appeared here in Fitteburg, will be given, in the form of W. S. Gilbert's "Gretchen" and was marked by as remarkable an ovation as

New York, for the past six months, and will be transplanted here intact. The scenic and general effects are reported to be very grand, and it is reported to be in every way a more brilliant success than even "Adonis" of beloved memory, Direy's chief hit has been made in the court room scene in the second act. His picture of the Justice is humorous, and soon takes the fancy of his andisness. The introduction of a troupe of burlesquers in court who had been arrested for playing on Sunday, which they had neglected to advertise as a sacred concert, was exceedingly effective. The costumes are brought out brilliantly against the somber background of the court room. The Judge agrees to discharge the prisoners if they will give a performance of his comic opera, whereupon a condensation of a modern comic opera was presented, which elicits always hearty applause, Dixey's rendering of Hopper's song. But There are Things," with his minitation of the Clover comedian, is very clever. This is followed by a reproduction almost as clever of Francis Wilson's "Little Pesch" song. In this song Dixey is assisted by Cora Tiunie, one of the burlesquers, who gives a spirited imitation of Marie Jansen. The lines on, which the "Seven Ages" is built are laid with clever ingenuity. The piece is full of clever possibilies, which are more than availed of by clever Dizey. Other bright lights in the piece are George W. Howard, Herbert Gresham, George H. Schiller, and the ladies are Marie Williams, Elaine Ellison. Cora Tinnie, Geraldine McCann, Marion Giroux and a host of other bretty girls, who are always to be found in Rice's productions.
