

Bill. "Ar, no, no. Not since last night at all. An 'what hev come him, Master Teare."

"He hev not been home all night."

And with that Peter Teare went on his way, telling his strange story through the village. Bet's Bill, as soon as he could collect his scattered wits, went in the opposite direction, following the road by which the old man had come.

But about an hour later, while all the villagers were getting in groups out of doors, discussing the disappearance of John Teare, some with black looks toward Dan Kinrade, who stood alone in front of the public house, he came rushing back, almost literally venting a term, his lanky body was so bent with the exertion of running. His face was pale as death, and his eyes were staring and his usually vacant face was expressive of the utmost horror.

"Oh, murder! murder!" he cried. "John Teare is killed dead. I seen him with my own eyes."

Old Peter Teare gripped him by the arm. "Where was that?" he asked.

"In the ditch in Dan Kinrade's turnip field."

"Listen to that, now," said Peter Teare. "It was in the ditch. 'Come on, Bet's Bill, show us the place.'"

The two went on ahead, Peter still retaining his grip upon the arm of Bet's Bill. The road was a narrow one, and the ditch like a flock of frightened sheep. They passed Hattie, standing white-faced at her mother's door. She dared not ask any questions, and she had no time to do so.

They passed the cottage in which Dan Kinrade lived with his two sisters and his mother. The door was open, and the light shined in. Into this field Bet's Bill, passing through a gap in the wood fence, led the way. And in the ditch, he had said, lay the body of John Teare, the sightless eyes turned up to the sunny sky.

A cold thrill ran through the crowd when they saw that they had indeed been told nothing but the truth. Among that semi-circle of startled faces was one that turned toward the ditch. Suddenly the eyes darkened with horror; the next moment the darkness of night had swept over them. With a cry of "Hattie! Hattie!" the crowd rushed, and playing hands carried her home to her mother.

This little commotion excited the spectators to recover from the first effects of the shock. They began to talk in whispers. "Is he dead, do you think?" asked one. "Ay, dead as a herring, poor fellow," answered another.

"Maybe there's life in 'im yet, though," said a third, and was for stepping down into the ditch to see.

But at this there was a general shout: "Don't touch him, lad! don't touch him, whatever you do. Wait till the constable comes!"

The constable arrived shortly afterward—a stout, slow, gray-whiskered man. He was old to the business, but new to such business as this. He was a plain, sturdy fellow, with a dead—a fact which some few had doubted, for although the face was white and rigid, there was no external mark of violence, and no indication of any wound. He did the constable's survey of the ground lead to any discovery. The turnips were slightly trampled, but not enough to point to any track. No trace of a weapon could be found.

By the constable's directions the body was carried to the cottage, the crowd still following. Peter Teare went with them, his uneasy little eyes scanning each face in turn. He tried hard to find out from his neighbors who they supposed to be the cause of his nephew's death, but they were cautious men and not one would give a definite answer. So, with some guarded replies, he turned away, only Bet's Bill staying behind to poke a bit in the ditch.

As soon as possible the coroner was informed of what had happened. He drove to the spot, summoned the jury, and examined the scene of the murder and inspected the body. A ter that there was an adjustment about the next day, when some sensational evidence was given.

One or two other witnesses having been disposed of, the constable described the findings of the body and produced a bloodstained pickaxe, which he had discovered in a cow shed belonging to Dan Kinrade. Then Dr. Smithson, a faded little man who was supposed to be a witness, came forward, stated that he had found six wounds in the body, three pairs entering at the back and penetrating the chest, the wounds in each pair being about an inch apart and exactly corresponding in this respect to the prongs of the pickaxe found. He had no doubt in his own mind that this was the weapon which had done the deed.

Then Peter Teare proved that his nephew had gone out between 8 and 9 o'clock on the morning of the murder, and that he had not returned. No one seemed to know anything of the subsequent movements of the unfortunate man, for Hattie was too ill to appear, and, moreover, had not mentioned the fact that Bet's Bill also had kept his information to himself. The quarrel between Kinrade and the deceased was next gone into, and the remainder of the evidence was devoted to elaborating this point.

Finally Dan Kinrade himself, after being cautioned, was asked whether he wished to make a statement.

"I never done it," he said sullenly. "That was all they could get out of him. He made no answer when asked to account for the stains of blood on his hands, and he refused to say where he had been or what he had done on the previous night; he remained obstinately silent. Among those who saw him there was one man, however, who saw him there with a serious expression. After a very short consultation the jury returned a verdict of 'Willful Murder' against Daniel Kinrade, who was accordingly sentenced to the gallows. He was arrested and taken off to jail.

no answer could be extracted from him. The Judge intimated. How, he asked, could witness be expected to conceal the loss of a man? "He hev not been home all night."

In his summing up, however, he suggested a possible connection. Was it unlikely, he asked, that prisoner had been caught by accident in the act of killing the sheep, that this had led to a renewal of the feud between them, and that the death of one had been the result? Certain portions of the evidence (which, for the sake of brevity, has been omitted) favored this hypothesis.

In the end the jury found the prisoner "Guilty," and he was sentenced to death; the Judge's comment being that, although the evidence was purely circumstantial, his four years' stay in prison before his death and his usually vacant face was expressive of the utmost horror.

"Oh, murder! murder!" he cried. "John Teare is killed dead. I seen him with my own eyes."

Old Peter Teare gripped him by the arm. "Where was that?" he asked.

"In the ditch in Dan Kinrade's turnip field."

MEDICAL SUCCESS.

The Wonderful Work Achieved by Drs. Copeland & Blair.

MR. MOORE'S INTERESTING EVIDENCE.

As stated in last week's issue of The Dispatch, Dr. W. H. Copeland, of 66 Sixth Avenue, returned to this city a short time ago, and has since been busily engaged with his extensive practice. That Dr. Copeland's popularity with the general public has not decreased through his enforced absence can readily be seen by a visit to his handsome offices at the above address, where large numbers of persons can be found at all hours waiting to consult with him on the various diseases which he has made his specialty.

By skillful treatment of the various cases brought under his care Dr. Copeland has built up one of the largest practices in this city. The newspapers daily have an account of some individual case in which he has been eminently successful. They are selected from few among the many hundreds of cases which Dr. Copeland treated successfully during the past year.

He has gained for himself an enviable reputation not only here, but also throughout all Western Pennsylvania and Eastern Ohio. He has certainly done more good for people suffering from diseases in his special line than any physician who has located in Pittsburgh for years.

A Great Success.

The individual case, to which the attention of the public is called this week, is that of Mr. James Moore, residing at Reynoldsville, Pa., a busy town on the P. V. & C. Railroad, about four miles from this city. He is employed in Hayes' coal mines.

Mr. Moore states: "I suffered greatly for six years. I tried a number of physicians, but could obtain no relief. My trouble grew worse instead of better."

"The dropping from my head had stopped. My nose no longer sore, and I can eat with out difficulty. My head is clear, and the ringing in my ears has ceased. To-day I am free from the symptoms I name, and owe my recovery to Drs. Copeland & Blair."

Mr. Moore's interesting evidence is given in full in the accompanying advertisement, and is a most interesting and valuable contribution to the medical literature of the day.
