Nith's Valley Rich in Memories of the Poet Burns.

NEW LIGHT ON HIS CHARACTER Found Among the Lowly and at the Home of His Great-Granddaughter. JEAN ARMOUR BURNS BROWN VISITED

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE DISPATCE. ANNAN, SCOTLAND, August 8 .- Complete as is the identification of the man Burns with place, scene and memorial in old Dumfries town, there is a far more pleasant association to be found between Burns the poet-larmer, Burns the poetfarmer-exciseman, Burns the poet-exciseman, and the lovely valley of the Nith. Burns' boyhood is a legacy to the winding Doon, in Ayr. The activities of his manbood are a heritage to the Nith, and the dale or vale through which it makes its songfu! way to the Solway and the sea. The etymology of its name is Gaelic, as is true of mine-tenths of the names of natural features of the country, and of the cities, towns and villages of to-day in Scotland as well as in Ireland. Neithe was the Gaelic water-god; hence Neith, and Nith; and a more lovely stream could not have been found in Scotland for honoring, or being honored by, the Coming from its crystal cradle among the mountains of Eastern Ayrshire, it wimples along in a southwesterly course, watering the royal burgh of Sanguhar and the ducal willage of Thornhill, thence passing the stupendous mass of Drumlanrig Castle, which looks down upon the plain with its innumerable windows "like a great presiding idol, the embodied genius of feudalism. Near this the sister stream and dale of the Clyde are reached by the lofty pass of Euterkin. Soon the Nith, after passing Ellisland, the lovely tarmhouse of Burns is joined by the Cluden water-which, at Irongray, but four miles to the westward, murmurs past the grave of Helen Walker, whom Scott immortalized as "Jennie Deans"—beneath the shadows of Lincluden Abbey ruins, when now, broad and melodious over glittering shallows, or slowly moving over quiet depths, the river sweeps under the red bridge arches of Dumiries, and for eight miles to the Solway Firth flows stately on through a shin-ing and spacious plain like that of Lom-bardy in miniature.

BICH IN BURNS RELICS. Their hearts all went out to the man, for had he not lived as they lived; had he not known the things they know; joyed and suf-fered in all the humble things in which they had joyed and suffered; and were not his songs the rhythm, rhyme and soul of their own vague hungerings? No one who will come among this peasantry to-day, loitering here and there where he lingered, need go to the books for tender things about Burns. These people all have them in the very core of their hearts and, with glowing faces, at their tongues' end. Everywhere your wanderings may lead, at this farmhouse you will learn of unrecorded kindness; at the pext, of some pleasant incident; at another, of an odd adventure; now of perhaps a forgivable roystering; then, of some blessed help in time of need; again, of festivity of which he was the life; and here again, of How, at the Kirkpatrick-Durham fair, where he came upon another brewing, and, having asked fiercely of the inmates of the cabin if such had been going on, a servant cannily replied, "We had na license for that;" whereupon a wee lassie innocently confessed that "the muckle black kist (chest) is fu' o' the bottles o' yill (ale) that nither sat a 'up nicht brewin' for the fair!" when Burns instantly eyed a bird hanging lassie's to the fore;" and left the cabin with Brown, with whom an American ge the remark, "We're in a hurry now; but has an engagement for the evening? when we return from the fair we'll examine the muckle black kist!" How when he had swered. caught "auld widow Jenny," of Dunscore, in possession of a large stock of smuggled tobacco, and, from public knowledge of the case, was compelled to make a seizure, he Brown." did it in this extraordinary fashion.

"Jeany," said Burns, gravely, "I knew this would be the upshot." Then to Lewars, his assistant, "Here, Lewars, take note of the number of rolls as I count them. Now, Jock, did ye ever hear an auld wife numbering her threads before check-reels were invented? 'Thou's ane, and thou's no ane, an' thou's ane out-'listen!" As he counted and handed out the rolls, every other one was dropped into "auld widow Jenny's"

THE BROW WELL.

The Solway Firth, when the tide is in or out, is a magical arm of the sea because the exciseman Burns bravely captured smugglers upon it, and because its mere name ebbs and flows through the measure of his verse. Mist-crowned Criffel looming above, is now a landmark in literature as well as in topography, and since Burns' time has had the attention of a Longfellow, a Wordsworth, a Ruskin and a Carlyle, because of just two lines he penned,

"The Nith shall run to Corsincor And Criffel sink to Solway-"

before a foreign foe should be permitted to rally on British ground. One has not a bundredth part the interest in that finest ecelesisstical ruin in the south of Scotland, Sweetheart Abbey, which stands by Nithsmouth at Criffel's teet, or in that other ma-jestic ruin, Carlaverock Castle, unquestionably the choicest specimen of castellated architecture in the whole of Scotland, as in o'd Brow Well, not two miles from the lat-ter; where Buros made his last stand against death, only to be borne home to the Mill street cottage, in Dumfries, to die. And this Brow well has been singularly overlooked by lovers of Burns visiting Nithsdale. It is distant but an eight miles' tramp south from Dumíries, on the Ruthwell road. It is locally called "The Broo" (Brow), and lies at the brow of the Locher Moss, a few hundred feet back from the Solway tideedge. An ancient "clachan" or prehistoric stone once stood near, and the half dozen stone houses of the neighborhood have taken the name of "the auld clachan o' the Broo." These houses, as in Burus' time, are rude structures, merely hinds' houses. The road to Ruthwell, which is but a mile or so dis-tant, winds past the place; and a little delving into antiquities makes curious and not altogether improbable the conjecture that Ruthwell-Ruth being English for the Gaelic Ruadh, red-was the name for the locality originally comprising that village, the Red Well itself and the clachan or stone circle for the celebration of pagan rites and ceremonials. For Brow Well, of whose waters Burns for months vainly partook is truly a red well, being strongly impregnated

Tradition, too, places Brow Well among those possessing miraculous powers. Step-ping a few feet from the roadside toward the Solway, there is found a deep pit open to the Firth at the south. In the center of this is the well, square, but a few inches deep, and perhaps five feet across; altogether more a stone basin than a well, to which three stone steps descend. The water filling it trickles through a spout from the base of the bank "brow" above, and its overflow forms a tiny burn which, wimpling and broadening in its descent, is reinforced by other half-hidden rills from Locher Moss, until it cuts a clear and distinct way through until it cuts a clear and distinct way through the reddish gray sands of the Solway. In this dreary place Burns remained, taking the waters of "The Broo", from the middle seriously that he had long ago given up of April until the middle of July, 1796. His only companions were his thoughts and his "worn pocket Bible." His eyes could rest upon but one scene—the roaring or sobrest upon but one scene. There were no elaborate toilets, no formality. The Prince explained half seriously that he had long ago given up wearing full dress except on state occasions. "I sound," he said, "that I lost 36 days every year in dressing. During the war I was finally obliged to wear my uniform bing Solway and the darkening range of constantly in order to save time. I was the English hills on the Cumberland side of summoned frequently before the Emperor, the Firth. Remembering it all, that is one line of English shore whose mystic mists to occasion required too much time."

AFOOT IN SCOTLAND. my eyes seem endlessly fraught with a tinge of dolor and sadness.

Far pleasanter associations and memories Far pleasanter ass than those of Brow Well cluster about the upper Nithsdale region. Here, not two miles from Dumfries is that lovely ivygrown ruin, Lincluden Abbey, at the con-fluence of Cluden water and Nith. Just bewond, to the east, is Dalswinton Hall, where lived the generous and ingenious Patrick Miller, notable not only for his connection with the earliest experiments in steam navi-gation but as the big-hearted owner of Ellisand the farm Burns took when fresh from his laurels at Edinburgh. WHERE HE FOUND HAPPINESS. This little farm, now comprising 135 acres, banks, about five miles north of Dumfries: cottage which to this day stands embedded in roses and ivy, brought his bonnie Jean to live with her the only happy days he ever knew. I never saw quite so songful and idyllic a spot—songful in every field and copse bird that border Scotland knows, and wonderfully songful in the waters of the Nith which, between banks white with daisies, bordered closer down with yellow broom spreads wide across gleaming shallows, as i mission here was to sing endless and tenier melodies in honor of the spot where the inspired plowman sang in his clearest, purest, grandest strains. For here in this farmhouse were produced among scores of lesser poems, "Taza O'Shanter," written in a day and denominated by Alexander Smith 'since Bruce lought Bannockburn, the best magnificent battle-piece, "The Song of Death," his wonderful satire, "The Kirk's Alarm," his matchless embodiment of con-nubial affection, "John Anderson, My Jo," "O Blaw Ye Westlin Winds," his "Address to the Nith," "On Seeing a Wounded Hare," that grand "Address to the Shade of Thomson," "Of a' the Airts the Winds Can Blaw," and that divinest of all his odes,

"To My Mary in Heaven."

Getting to this Ellisland farm brought me, in a singular and fortuitous way, within the radius of certain associations few have had the good fortune to enjoy. As they link the living with thrilling closeness and emphasis to the dead, brief account of this upusual experience will have interest to all lovers of Burns in America. At a late hour of a recent evening I was standing near the noble statue of Burns, erected in 1877, in Church place, Dumfries. The only other occupant of Church place at that time was a venerable Scotchman who, standing in the shadows of the Greyfriars' Church, seemed, though in merely an idle curiosity on his part, as intently regarding me as I had been studying the statue. I finally made bold to approach him with a request for information regard ing the road I should take to Ellisland, at the same time expressing my intention o visiting it on the morrow. The chance meeting was a pleasant one; and on dis-covering that the gentleman, Mr. Thomas Brown, of Queensbury street, was quite at leisure for the next day, I invited him to oin me on the excursion, to which he heartily acceded, and the day was a glorious one on account of his intelligent company; for his perfect familiarity with details of the life and experiences of the poet, at which I then wondered, though attributing the same the universal treasuring of Burns-lore by the people of Nithsdale, was a source of the greatest delight.

JAMES ARMOUR BURNS BROWN. The companionship resulted in a return invitation to visit my new-found friend's family on the same evening of the Ellisland journey. On presenting myself at his door, I was admitted by a young lady whose face and presence startled me as completely as though Robert Burns had himself greete me at the threshhold of that welcoming habitation. There stood a fair young woman, in whose face was repeated every lineament of the poet's. Her hair was raven black; her brows were broad and high; the eyes like flaming orbs; the nose perfectly chiseled: the mouth large, impassioned, tender; and the chin full rounded and dimpled. It was indeed Burns' face chastened and softened by the pure soul of a woman looking through it. Completely overcome by the extraordinary in a eage above the child's head, and said:

"If that bird speaks, there's no use of another speaking bird in this house while that "Is—is this the residence of Mr. Thomas Brown, with whom an American gentleman

"It is;" the young lady smilingly answered. "Father and mother are expecting "And you are?"-

"Their daughter, Jean Armour Burn It was to the home of the granddaughte and great-granddaughter of Robert Burns I had come. The cheery, handsome, whitehaired hostess of the evening, Mrs. Thomas Brown, a lady 60 years of age, who sang for us, "Of a' the airts the wind can blaw," with extreme pathos and feeling, is the sur-viving daughter of Robert Burns, Jr., the poet's oldest son, who died here in Dumfries in 1857, at the age of 70 years. His early education was chiefly the charge of Burns himself, and with him, hand in hand, he wandered again and again in every loved haunt of Nithdale from Criffel on the Solway to Friar's Carse, above Ellisland. page of this paper could be delightfully filled with the experiences of that evening and of later hours, in this plain and pleasant home—in itself a museum and shrine o Burns' memorial, relic and sentiment. Bu aside from these and the marvelous reproduction of figure, face and radiant speech o eyes and look of the poet in his great-grand-daughter, Jean Armour Burns Brown, two things came to me, with conviction which cannot be shaken, and which I would set down to remain, with earnest and solem emphasis. NEW LIGHT UPON BURNS. The first is, that Robert Burns, Jr., was man of extraordinary intellect, attainments and character. He was an attache of the British stamp office, in London, for 30 years, during which period, and to the day of his during which period, and to the day of his death, as I have evidence, he was one of the profoundest thinkers and scholars of his time. A no more learned scholar lived; and Carlyle himself was not his superior in depth of philosophical research. United with these, were qualities of heart and character which were grandly pure and sweet, which hidden and sectioned has localized. while hidden and restrained by a loyalty to his father's name and tame, to discern which gives one a glimbse of what true heroism means, was, as I also have evidence, a gift of the loftiest poetic power. With this new light upon father and son I cannot contemplate the many statements. contemplate the one's extreme attachmen to the other without feeling that a bond perhaps unconscious but still mighty, aside from the sacred filial tie, held the matured and budding, intellect so tenderly together The other thing I would say from convic tion is this: Jean Armour was a woman of loftier soul than has ever yet been depicted, Burns' genius was illimitably too great to require unworthy contrast to render it more surpassingly transcendent. Carlyle's defini tion of the function of woman—"to wed a man she can love and esteem; and to lead noiselessly under his protection, with all the wisdom, grace and heroism that is in her, the life prescribed in consequence, was illustrated supremely in the life of Jean Armour, the wife of Robert Burns; and her unaffected tribute to his kingship of affect tion in the poverty-scourged home they both loved, in her own words, "He ne'er spoke misbehadden word to me in a' his life," is as royal a tribute to his manly, if erring nature, notwithstanding all other evidence of men and pen, as the world can ever bring to brighten the memory of his immorta poetic genius.
