A RED MEN'S PROPHET

Legend of Tan-Ke-Wha, the Christian Convert of the Ute Tribe.

HOW HE ACCEPTED CHRISTIANITY.

He Lived a Hermit's Life, Reverenced by His Faithful People.

AN ENEMT'S POTION KILLS THE SAINT

In the latter part of the 70s, two good priests, who had heard of the lawless character of the Utes, were sent out as missionaries to Colorado, says a writer in the New colony of Utes, with Chief Ouray, encamped on Cherry Creek, near Denver. When the good fathers arrived they were treated with scorn, and were promptly repudiated by the Chief. After remaining in Denver a few days they set out for the Ute agency in the northwestern part of the State.

When they arrived there they were treated with great respect and their teachings listened to with reverence. Hundreds of converts were the fruits of their work.

THE NEW CONVERT.

Among the most attentive of the Indians was a chief of a minor grade, by name Moneta (Curling Hair). He became an enthusiast on the subject of religion, and he southern country they gave him a large wooden crucifix and chair. The tribe began to look upon him with feelings of reverence and awe, and, as he seemed to neglect his bodily comfort for his spiritual welfare, he was supplied with food and drink every The Seguerance morning and every night.

As spring approached the tribe moved out of the valley of the White river to a point four or five miles distant. They tried to per-sunde Moneta, whom they had rechristened Tan-ke-wha, the holy man, to come with them, but he only shook his head, and, pointing at the suspended crucifix, again prostrated himself before it, muttering the few Latin phrases which the priests had taught him. Then they left him.

FED BY DEVOTEES.

The new village was six miles away, but every morning and every night the braves would bring to Tan-ke-wha meat and drink. Had they not he would have starved, so great was his devotion. And the squaws would bring their pappooses to be blessed by him, and the warriors, before going on a hunt, would come and kneel before him, that they might have fortune in the chase.

Did a warrior die, his finest pelts were taken to Tan-ke-wha, and his weapons were sprinkled with holy water by the Indian devotee. Thus for months the Indian hermit lived quietly and peacefully. At last one day a warlike tribe came up from the South, and the warriors of the Utes moved the squaws, children and old men up in a safe mountain retreat and went forth to do battle. There was no time for preparations, not even a chance for a blessing-visit to the holy man in the valley, and they went away.

For six days the religious hermit lived upon the meat and drink within his reach, and when, for the seventh time since the war, the sun came up over the eastern mountain Tan-ke-wha was WITHOUT NOURISHMENT.

All that day he prayed, and in his deep devotion hardly missed the meat which was not there. Night brought thirst and cold. The sacred watch fires had long ago ceased smoking, although down in the depths of each pile of gray ashes nestled a dulled red eye. The thirst grew great, and although Tan-ke-wha could hear the musical ripple of the waters, he would not leave his erneifix for the few minutes it would take to quench

At the eighth sun he was so weak he could hardly raise his head to the wooden figure, but he murmured the words of the ritual just as he had when he was stronger. A clatter of hoofs was heard, and a Mexican rode up to the lodge. He drove his bro close up to the entrance. He saw six beaps of gray ashes, a great pile of fine furs, upon which lay the form of Tan-ke-wha, and his sharp eye also took in the dangling crucifix. The furs attracted him and he dismounted, and entering, touched the prostrate figure with his foot.

THE MEXICAN'S BARGAIN.

"Ha, you want to sell pelt?!" he asked. Slowly Tan-ke-wha turned his head. "No sell," he whispered. "For Jesus'

"Drink, ha? Well, pelt for drink," answered the other, as he held a two-quart canteen up and shook it tauntingly in the Indian's face.
"Drink, for Holy Mary's sake, drink!"

"For pelt, good drink," persisted the Mexican, as he shook the canteen again. Slowly a thin, gaunt hand came forth and grasped the edge of one of the skins, and with evident effort the lean, brown body writhed away that the fur might be re-leased, and when he had succeeded, he said:

"Drink!" The stopper was screwed off the vessel and the opening was tilted toward his lips, and then he drank a few drops. The fluid coursed like fire through his veins, it strengthened

"Drink," he cried. "More pelt," demanded the Mexican, and as another skin was pushed off the heap Tanke-wha drank again.

WATER FROM HEAVEN.

"Ah, Maria be praised. You have sent Moneta water from heaven. Give me all," he said, turning to the Mexican, "and take pelts," touching the pile with his foot. "Si," said the man, smiling, as he handed the canteen over and began to gather up the While he strapped them on his bronco, Tun-ke-wha drank again and again.

He cried, he sang, and shouted commands to an invisible army of warriors. God had rewarded him with drink from heaven and he was happy. There was no more trouble for him.
"Adios!" cried the Mexican, as he stuck his grinning face in the Mexican, as he stuck his grinning face in the tent.

"Farewell, God's man," biccoughed the drunken Indian, as he tried to bow. Then he fell in a heap on the ashes, still holding the beloved canteen to his breast, while the liquor flowed over his garments. As he fell asleep his woolen shirt pressed upon the smouldering snayk of one of the bears. It smouldering spark of one of the heaps. It smoked for an hour or two, and then a little finger of fiame shot up.

THE PROPHET'S PATE

It grew into an arm, which held Tan-kewha in a firm embrace until his identity was lost by other arms which came from

He struggled to his feet, cried to the crucifix and fell as if the flames, like hungry monsters, had dragged him down to their

Days later the warriors came back. They went in a body to the valley to see Tan-ke-wha. The wind had blown the ashes to and fro, and the place was desolate. There was not even a relic left of Tan-ke-wha, but the not even a relic left of Tan-Ke-wha, but the cloud swayed to and fro above the lodge.

"He is there," said one, pointing at the cloud, although he did not realize how close he came to the truth. But the memory of so great a man must always remain green, so the warriors set about to build a monu-ment. For a week they lived and worked in the valley, collecting and placing one on the other the stones which made the monument over the tepes. The crucifix and the remnants were placed on the ground and the stones piled over them. They built up to the top of the cloud and then stopped. The provisions they had brought were placed on top of the pile for Tan-ke-wha's spirit; then reverently they filed away.

THE YANKEE BOAT WON. AMERICA AND ENGLAND PITTED AGAINST EACH OTHER

an Ocean Race From Para, Brazil, to New York-Brittannia Doesn't Rule the Waves so Much Now-Details of the Brittannia does not rule the waves be tween New York and Pars, Brazil, as much as she used to not many months ago. The advent of the new Yankee steamship Segueranes, of the United States and Brazil Mail Steamship Company, has changed all that. The Segueranca completed on Saturday last her first round trip between Brazil and New York.

Almost simultaneously with her sailing from Para, on October 22, early in the morning, the British steamship Paraense York Sun. At that time there was a small of the Red Cross line, turned her from prow northward. She is the best boat of the Red Cross line, and she put on a little extra steam to beat the American steamer to New ship into New York by more than an hour. It was a stern chase—proverbially long—for nearly seven days. Less than half a day before she rushed past Sandy Hook at 5:30 o'clock on Saturday morning, the Sanuaranea passed the Paragene, which was worked so faithfully to help the priests that when, several months later, they left for the southern country they gave him a large there at 6:40, just 1 hour and 20 minutes later. The time of the Segueranca, allowing for the time she lost at Barbadoes and St. Thomas, was over 24 hours better than

> The Paraense sailed direct to New York from Para. The Segueranca headed for Barbadees, one of the windward islands, and the two ships parted company. After taking additional cargo and mail at Barbadoes, the Segueranca steamed to St. Thomas, one of the Virgin islands, where she remained half a day.

The Segueranca covered the distance between St. Thomas and New York in the re-markable time of 4 days, 15 hours and 30 minutes. She is commanded by Captain James R. Beers, a gallant Yankee tar, and the commodore of the line.

NATIONAL BOARD OF TRADE

Asked for by the Maritime Association of

New York. NEW YORK, November 8 .- The Maritime Association of New York to-day forwarded a petition to the Commissioners of the Treasury Department, now sitting in Washington, asking them to consider the estab-lishing of a Marine Board, Department of Commerce, or Board of Commerce, in our Government. The petition sets forth that New York has a membership of 1,400 and represents the commerce of the port, which dispatches more than one-half of the foreign trade of the country. It advocates the es-tablishment of a Board of Commerce similar tablishment of a Board of Commerce similar to the British Board of Trade.

The views of the association as to how such a board should be organized and officered are given at length. It emphatically says that no political tests should be connected with any of the appointments. The members should be chosen solely on the basis of their knowledge and fitness for the place.
