The outside buyer has as completely disappeared as if he had never existed. The Standard is master of the situation, and as it has always been hostile to the exchanges, no change in its attitude can reasonably be expected. Producers must help themselves. Brokers who favor changing the manner of trading by going back to the cash system and cutting loose from all entangling alliances think it will broaden the market by interesting outsiders, and causing sufficient fluctuations to make trading attractive. These seem to be good reasons for the change. It can do no harm in any event, and may do good by lifting a great interest out of the rut.
