

DONALD MCGREGOR

What you too, Flo! another gull! You, whom I have held up as the cleverest and the most sensible of all women! You're all alike, bless you! Little hearts, the bigger the imposture the more you enjoy it; yet I did think you pegs above the mob.

And Jack Carrington throws himself back in his easy chair, clasping his hands behind his head, his eyes sparkling with delight at Mrs. Borrowdale's look of indignation. Jack is a man who is allowed a good deal of license in chaffing the fair sex. He is handsome as a young god, and light-hearted as a schoolboy, though he has reached his 25th year, and is on the eve of marriage.

"Oh, well!" she answers, getting up reluctantly. "A man convinced against his will, remains an unbeliever still." You have not gone far enough yet to form an opinion. I dare say, after all you've forgotten when he really died. I would bet a $5 note that when you refer to your death-bed at Haslar, you will find that the date is right after all. I never saw a spirit say wrong on that matter before.

"Aha!" she responds, with a twinkle in his eyes. "You and he imagined 'September 27' between you." Here the door opens, and in comes present I fancy I can feel the spirits blowing over my face and I get so fanciful I imagine all sorts of things. I could almost swear that I have entered the room, something whispered low in my ear 'September 27'.

"Low in your ear?" echoes Jack, brushing the air with his hand. "Why, we've been bandying those few words backwards and forwards again and again. No wonder you're so glib. Flo and her table, that's the date on your brain, and will have it that the so-called spirit died on that day, when he was, to my knowledge, alive and kicking. It's a queer, my little girl, and I think you are in the right to leave such things alone."

"Cis is highly meditative," says Flo. "She would be invaluable to me if she were a first-rate trance medium." "Heaven forbid," replies Jack, laughing. "Come, shall we have a turn on the radio? It is cool now, and we can pull up the window and have moonlight, if you girls like it."

It wants but three days to Cis' wedding day, the never-ending consultations with the druggists and modistes, which have so often interrupted Jack's tete-a-tetes with his lady love are over at last. Their little house is complete, and wanting only inhabitants. The route for their wedding tour is mapped out, and there remains but one thing for Jack to provide, a little gold circlet, which Cis has more than once mentioned in the drawing-room, or 'parlor' as the landlady designates it.
