Fon an officer who has been at the head of department for comparatively so short a time, Colonel Osthaus, the General Inspector of rifle practice, has made himself about as unpopular as can well be imagined. Ageneral unpopular as can well be imagined. Ageneral feeling of discontent has gredually crept into the shooting department of the Guard, and with the possible exception of Seranton, hot shot is being poured at Colonel Osthaus from all portions of the State. His manner of roling out the team from the City Troop, of Philadelphia, during the contexts at Mt. Gretna two weeks ago, has not tended to increase his popularity in the eastern por-tion of the State. Possibly Colonel Osthaus is laboring under the misfortune of being overslandowed by his predecessor Colonel Watres.

PLANS of various kinds for the consolida-tion of the National Guards of the United States and placing them directly under control of the War Department are still being pretty thoroughly discussed. Its idea originated among officers of the regular originated among officers of the regular service while visiting camps in the West, but the conclusion seems to have been ar-rived at that the scheme is scarcely feasible. Little attention has been paid to the inniter in this State, and the few officers who have considered the idea at all deem it III advised and dangerous. General Miles in speaking of the subject said, "I do not believe in con-solidating the State troops and forming them into practically a standing army of 100,000 men and placing them under control of whoever may be Secretary of War. Any officers who are considering the matter are acting on their own responsibility and have no authority for expressing their opinions.
