Mean Much More to the Metropolis Than the Stock Exchange.

WALL STREET IS A BIG FACTOR. But Not a Bit More So Than Labor and the

Cost of Living. MATTHEW MARSHALL'S TOPICAL TALK

SPECIAL TELEGRAM TO THE DISPATCH. NEW YORK, March 13 .- "New York's Local Industries," is the title of Matthew Marshall's article for to-morrow's Sun, which he trents as follows: After the tempestuous activity of the previous fortnight comparative calm has reigned in Wall street the past week. A little ripple of excitement was created by the announcement that the Standard Off Trustees would submit to the decision against them in the Ohio Supreme Court and dissolve the trust. One of large proportions occurred in the coal stocks, upon the passage by the New Jersey Legislature of an act legalizing the re-The passage of the St. Paul dividend made some talk, and just at the last a rumor, still unverified, that the Sugar Refiners' Competitor by absorbing the Harrison Refinery in Philadelphia gave to the company share a considerable advance in price. On the whole the market has been quiet, and the nurchasers at the recent high figures of stocks like New York and New England Reading, Lackswanna, Lake Shore and Eric have had abundant leisure to ruminate upon have had abundant leisure to ruminate upon the value of their bargains.

People who keep their eyes fixed exclusively upon the Stock Exchange, and measure by its ups and downs the prosperity of the country, may be inclined to deplore this slackened activity in its business. But Wall street is not the world—it is not even the whole of the city of New York, and while the volume of its transactions is an index of the intensity of speculative enterprise among a very useful class of citizens, it shrinks and swells without reference to the steady ouward progress of daily industry.

The Industries as Business Factors.

The Industries as Business Factors, The building and running of railroads, the mining of coal, the manufacture of pig iron and steel rails, the refining of sugar and of petroleum, and the spinning and weaving of tton are undeniably important factors i the increase of the country's wealth, and the money value of the capital thus em-ployed is ascertained by Stock Exchange prices, but the aggregate result of the thou-sand little unnoticed forms of human labor which surround us are much more important.
The State census, just taken, indicates that the combined population of New York and Brooklyn is not far from 2,800,000. To these Brooklyn is not far from 2,800,000. To these may properly be added the residents of Jersey City, Staten Island, and of the belt of adjoining suburbs closely connected with New York, since they are, for business purposes, all New Yorkers. Taking these in carries the total population of this metropolitan center considerably above 2,000,600. That is to say, more people are living within an hour's journey of our City Hall than were to be found in the whole 13 North American colonies when they rebelled against British rule and formed themselves into the present independent United States of America. Even so late as 1850 the entire State of New York had but 3,100,090 inhabitants, and today the territory of once populous Greece lay the territory of once populous Greece onteins but 2,000,000.

Figures Too Big For Comprehension, These figures, I am gware, convey no very lefinite idea to the mind, any more than say ing that the distance from the earth to the un is 95,000,000 miles conveys an idea of the vast space that senarates us from that luminary. The moon looks quite as far off as the sun, although it is really only the four-hundredth part as distant. The time when one gets the most vivid imression of the immense mass of humanity which lives and toils beneath the roof of this "province covered by houses"—as New York is entitled to be called, as well as London—is when some considerable quantity of it is collected together by a fire, a procession, or even so triffing a thing as the hoisting of an iron safe into an upper story window. When the Harlem Railroad stables on Thirty-second street were burned a few years ago, I remember distinctly the crowd that second street were burned a few years ago, I remember distinctly the crowd that gathered upon Murray Hill to witness it. It was about the hour that working people, clerks, and shop girls were going home by the way of the Thirty-fourth street ferry, and they naturally stopped to see the sight. The assemblage blackened the whole hill, like a swarm of ants, and defied enumeration. The Centennial celebration of 1889 brought many greater multitudes into the streets, who, when looked down upon from above, formed a perfect pavement of heads. Every night and morning, too, the North and East river ferry boats, the Brooklyn bridge cars, the elevated railway trains, and the surface cars present to view great clusters of humanity, and I never see them, nor the streams on the side-walks of our thoroughfares, without a senwalks of our thorough fares, without a seu sation of apprehension, as if of some mon strous weight.

Great Consumers and Producers. These millions of human beings, these thousands of tons of living flesh and blood, are both consumers and producers. They consume what is produced by others and produce what others consume and this mutual exchange of services constitutes a trade of far greater importance, as I have said, than the transactions of Wall street. Three million mouths to feed, $,000,000 bodies to cloth, $,000,000 men, women and children to be housed, warmed, employed and the results of labor and the food they eat, the clothes they wear, the fuel they burn and the commodities they require for the satisfaction of their natural and artificial wants form a mass of wealth of enormous value. I am sorry that I have not been able to procure the statistics of the United States census of 1890, and have been thus restricted to those of the census gathered ten years previous, but these will serve pretty nearly as well to show the magnitude of this city's local industries. According to the census of as well to show the magnitude of this city's local industries. According to the census of 1880, New York is the largest manufacturing city in the United State, its production exceeding that of Philadelphia nearly one-half. The gross value of the goods manufactured here and in Brooklyn, and Jersey City was $710,423,434, and in the net value after deducting that of materials employed was $253,357,717. To do the work 286,677 hands were employed at a cost of wages of $132,140,135.

New York's Chief Industries The leading industry in this city was the making of clothing, and it is so still, I presume, because garments of all kinds are made here in immense quantities, not only for local consumption, but for shipment to other parts of the country. Malt liquors come next, then books, newspapers and periodicals, and then tobacco in various periodicals, and then tobacco in various forms, all of which articles, like clothing, are partly for our town consumption.

Next to these leading commodities are furniture, marble works, from work, tinware and blacksmiths' and carrienters' work, the last two being undoubtedly almost all for local customers, al. on a great deal beside is done in Connectiout and New Jersey for city customers, because of the greater cost of doing it here. Exactly how much of the other products I have mentioned is consumed here, and how much is sent away, no information can be obtained, and it is not essential to my purpose. All the goods are sold here, and if to the 3,000,000 resident customers must be added some portion of the sold here, and if to the 3,000,000 resident customers must be added some portion of the remaining 57,000,000 inhabitants of the United States, beside those of Canada, Mexico and South America, it does not impair the value of the local trade of the inetropolis.

Of the amount of food and fuel consumed in New York and its environs there is no official report. Our cities do not, like Paris, put barriers around themselves and make everything eatable and drinkable pay duty. I suppose that the quantity of milk, fresh vegetables and butchers' meat daily brought into New York and the adjacent cities might be ascertained by any who would take the trouble to set a watch upon the ferry boats and railroad trains, but even this would fail to show the consumption.

Much Money Needed for Living. Aminspection of many of our streets no exclusively devoted to residences reveals an indefinite number of bakers, butchers and narketmen, all of whom make their living marketmen, all of whom make their living by feeding, for remuneration, their fellow ettizens. Then, there are the coal and wood dealers to be reckoned, and the money that passes through their hands is a very considerable amount.

Besides its consumption of its manufactures and of food and fuel supplies, this metropolis imports for its own use great quantities of goods manufactured elsewhere, and the trade in these and in jewelry and precious stones, pictures, porcelains and similar valuable articles supports a great many people. Then there are drugs, perfumes, soaps and cosmetics, and no end of necessary and unnecessary knick-knacks, the sale of which furnishes a living to many thousands of shopkeepers, big and little.

The bor bought and sold here for the construction and adornment of buildings, which the census does not reckon among manufacturing goods, is another large item in our local business. Masons, plasterers, stonecutters, and common laborers collect millions of dollars annually, which they distribute to those who supply their wants. At the other end of the scale are actors, singers, musicians, scene painters, and other people whose work does not produce tangible results, but which, nevertheless, has a market value.

Wall Street Not the Whole City. I think that upon a consideration of all these facts my readers will agree with what I said at the outset, that the business done in and around Wall street in trading in raiload stocks and bonds, coal stocks, mining stocks and other securities representing in stocks and other securities representing in-vestments in remote localities, is not to be compared in importance with our local in-dustries. We have a large trade, it is true, which depends for its profits upon the pros-perity of the country as a whole, but at the same time we have one larger which comes from our own immediate neighborhood and which takes no account of the fluctuations of the stock market.

40c PER POUND.

But I will sell you a better article in my own brand, McKee's 2-pound can for 35c, les than half the price, and if it is not as good as our money. Under the present prices of the materials, no pound of baking powder should cost more than 18c at retail, and take my word for it that all you pay over 18c you pay for the name and for the millions spent n advertising. I sell thousands of pounds of my own bak ing powder on its merits, and am not driven to the contemptible necessity of sending emissaries from house to house to belittle and misrepresent all other baking powders out my own. I am frank to admit that there are as good baking powders in the market as mine. All I claim is that I sell
