

CALLED BY THE BELLS.

How Murderer Fitzpatrick Spent His Last Sunday on Earth.

VISITED BY SISTERS OF CHARITY.

At the Sound of a Christian Anthem He Fell to Praying.

LESS CHEERFUL THAN FORMER DAYS.

Saturday Fitzpatrick spent the night in deep slumber, but the day had scarce broken before his eyes were opened. He lay for a moment simply staring vacantly into space. The look that rested on the condemned murderer's face was that of one who in his mind was struggling with some awful sight, and when awakening fears to move lest it return. The morning light breaking through the fog in the narrow courtyard only partly dispelled the gloom of the prison and the big are light flickered dimly in the dome. Yet there was sufficient light to show he had not rested well, though he afterward declared he did not sleep a wink. He had a great deal of trouble in the night, and he had heard the bells and knew that they foretold the coming day.

His Last Sunday on Earth.

His last Sunday on earth had commenced and but two days of life were left him. In the morning he was in a very nervous state, and he had heard the bells and knew that they foretold the coming day. That these thoughts filled his mind was shown by the fact that he was unable to rest, and he was in a very nervous state. He was in a very nervous state, and he had heard the bells and knew that they foretold the coming day.

Visitors Upon a Holy Errand.

At last visitors were announced, and in came two black-robed nuns of Mercy, one an aged hunchback, and the other a sweet-faced woman past the middle age. They entered the cell and the death watch began with the nuns kneeling before the murderer, who was most devout. He seemed to tell them much of his past. They remained with him until noon, and then they left. Fitzpatrick's spiritual adviser, Canon, the guard again returned, and the murderer was left alone with the priest he again repeated prayers. After they left, Fitzpatrick was a little more cheerful for a time, but soon he again came to his old state of mind. He was in a very nervous state, and he had heard the bells and knew that they foretold the coming day.

THE RIGHT TO SMOKE.

The Mayor to Investigate the Suppression of the Police Magistrate Ordinance. Mayor Kennedy is still anxious to find out how the police magistrate ordinance was held back. He is still unable to leave the house, but expects to come out this afternoon. When told yesterday how both the reformers and the Hunter faction were ready to sign the present ordinance he only smiled a sad smile and looked wise. Then he said: "It makes little difference, for I could appoint a police magistrate who would sign it. I want to know is who is responsible for not signing that ordinance. No one has the right to smother a measure, and especially after it has been ordered printed for Council. I intend to find out."
