A STORY OF WAR TIME IN PITTSBURG

The punishment inflicted on young Iams by Colonel Streator is still one of the most interesting topics of discussion throughout the city. Wherever one may go he hears it, and the conclusions drawn and comparisons made are irequently interesting and instructive. Of this class was an apropos story told among a group of old residents yesterday, which illustrates the condition of affairs in this city during the war, and the circumstance will no doubt be remembered by thousan ds who are now living.

The time of the story was in January, 1863. The calls for volunteers had nearly exhausted the supply of willing fighters; the dratt was in active operation and was very unpopular in this locality. Nearly every man who was qualified to go to the front was notified or drafted into the service. Those who for various reasons preferred to stay at home had the alternative of paying other men to go in their places.

Substitutes Came Pretty High.

The men who went under these circum stances were called substitutes, and the money they were paid was called bounty money, which was paid in addition to the regular monthly pay of the Government. At the time in question substitutes were scarce and bounties were high. From $500 to $1,000 was being paid for men in various parts of the country. In this city the rate was $800.

Such big inducements led to rascality as a matter of course, and it was not long until there was a class of men called bounty jumpers. They would go to Boston, for instance, and offer to go out as substitutes, accepting a bounty of $800 or $900 in cash. After enlisting and getting their money they would take the first opportunity to desert the army and then proceed to New York, go through the same course and follow it up by going to all the principal cities of the country, collecting bounties and deserting as soon as they received the Pitteburg was victimized in this respect as much as any other city. Colonel J. Herron Foster was Provost Marshal of the Herron Foster was Provest Marshal of the city, with headquarters in old Philo Hall, on Fourth avenue, just above Wood street. Captain James McHenry, since deceased, had charge of the guard, and the recruits were quartered in the upper floors of the building. One day there appeared at head-quarters as a substitute a handsome, wellproportioned young man, who gave his name as Williams. He was sworn in, received $800 in bounty from a subsequently prominent citizen, who had been drafted, and with the next batch of recruits sen out went to the front.

Williams Was Promptly Identified.

About three months later Williams reap-About three months later Williams reap-peared. He was taken into the Provost Marshal's headquarters by a young Dr. King, who drifted into the city a stranger some months before and who had established in his office adjoining the headquarters a sort of substitute brokerage business, col-lecting commissions from men who wanted subs as well as from those willing to act as such. Williams was not recognized at first such. Williams was not recognized at first, and, being of strong physique, had no diffi-culty in finding a purchaser for his services. He was sworn in again, received his bounty and was placed in the guardroom with the other subs until the next day. On the following morning, however, the Sergeant of the provost guard, John Meix-ner, recognized Williams and reported the bounty-jumper to Captain McHenry. The latter jumped to his feet in indignation, and, after pacing up and down the room several times, turned abruptly to the waiting Sergeant and commanded: "Go buy a rawhide, tie that fellow up and give him 40 stripes across the bare back." The sergeant proceeded at once to carry Deliciousness out the command. The terrified bounty jumper was tied up by the wrists in the guard room in the presence of the other re-cruits and received his sentence. He was badly bruised by his punishment, but the skin was not broken, and he would have been all right again in a few days had he been left alone. Within the Reach of All Colonel Foster Took the Responsibility. The maiter was kept quiet until the next day, when E. S. Morrow, the present City Controller, who was chief clerk in the Provost Marshal's office, went to the guard room to select the men to be forwarded to the front that day. The first man he saw on entering the room was Williams, the bounty jumper, sitting with his face buried in his hands as if crying. Morrow called the sergeant aside and ordered him to send Williams, the bound ordered him to send Williams to the front at once. "And for fear he jumps again," con-tinued Morrow, "put him in irons." "Well, I guess he'd better not be sent to-day," said the Sergeant, "I've just given him 40 stripes and he's hardly fit." Morrow was borrified. He realized that owing to the public prejudice against the draft, this incident would cause an uproar when it became known and that those who were opposed to the course of the adminis-tration would seize upon it to inflame the public mind to the fullest extent. As soon public mind to the fullest extent. As soon as he learned who had ordered the punish-ment he reported the whole matter to Colonel Foster. The Colonel was quick to perceive the probable consequences and in-stantly ordered that the matter be kept as quiet as possible. He assumed the entire responsibility for the act himself and in-structed Captain McHenry not to breathe a word implication him with the metter. word implicating him with the matter.

was sent out with a batch of recruits for the seat of war. He jumped from the train a few miles out from the city however, and returning he joined Dr. King, who had been released, and they went be-fore Alderman Donaldson, of the Fourth ward, where informations were entered against Colonel Foster, for aggravated as-sault and battery by Williams, and for false imprisonment by King. The Colonel was arrested and gave bail for a hearing. He then returned to his office, and, real-izing that he must have some support, sat Name. Thomas S. Water Mattle F. Miller Ernest H. Walter... FTERNOON, at 2 o'clock. His Jersey Consin. Much has been said of the ferocity of the Jersey mosquitos; but the mosquito of Pittsburg which inhabits the river shores, is a real bird of prey. He, she, or it, as the case may be, is the winged epitome of entomological cannibalism. His song is a weird whirr suggestive of agony and death. His sanguinary vocation is the science of phlebotomy, which he practices from eve till dawn, draining the veins of distressed human beings. The mosquito even outrivals his clumsy competitor, the bed - bug, which by the way, and, according to natural history, is a dwarf branch of the turtle family. HEATON-Entered into rest on Saturday. July 30, 1802, at 9:30 r. M., Mrs. ELIZARETH HEATON, wife of the late Captain Jacob Heaton, mother of Mrs. Ira F. Brainard, North Highland avenue, Pittsburg, Pa. floating in mid-air filled with blood drawn from manual—also womanly—veins, the mosquito presents the appearance of a large red balloon propelled by gauzy oars on either side. Being somewhat smaller, the Pittsburg mosquito is slightly less power-ful than the eagle; but he is ruler of the at-mosphere just the same. He is the king-bee anarchist of insects and the John L. Sullivan of the entomological ring, and no hyperbole about it, either.

Putting Up a Job on the Public.

During the day Williams sent for Dr. King and was permitted to see him private-ly. It was believed that the deserter was afraid of being shot, that being the popular punishment for desertion in those days, and that while the doator was with him he that while the doctor was with him he rubbed some kind of acid or poison on the fellow's back to make it very sore. At least it broke out in a jew days in a terrible running sore, and the efforts of the sur-geon to heal it were for a long time in-effectual, and they could account for the man's condition in no other way.

In the meantime Dr. King had circulated the story, with livid coloring, outside the headquarters. One or two of the city news-papers took it up and the story lost nothing of its brutal jeatures by their way of telling it. Papers all over the country livid telling of its brutal reatures by their way of telling it. Papers all over the country printed the story. It was harped on from day to day, here and elsewhere, just as the lams case has been. Such was the condition of public sentiment that a tremendous excitement was produced. In this city there was a dewas produced. In this city there was a de-mand for the execution of the sergeant who had inflicted the punishment and the im-mediate discharge from office of the provost marshal, his clerks and subordinate officers. On several occasions mobs gathered in the city and there was momentary danger of a general attack on the marshal's head-quarters.

A Long, Strong Rope Becommended. A long, Strong Rope Becommended. As in the Isms case, the general com-plaint was that Williams had not received a trial by court martial, and the Marshal had no right or authority to punish him otherwise. Dr. King was industrious in his efforts to keep up the furore which pre-vailed, and, assisted by the newspapers which sympathized with Williams, he suc-seeded admirably until one day. Concerd ceeded admirably until one day Colonel Foster ordered him arrested on a charge of attempting to incite a riot. King was locked up in the guard room with Williams for a few days, until the deserter's back
