Morpheus' strength must be on the wane, at least he fails to hold this man to his equilibrium, and the result is that every motion of the car sways Clarence his business didn't prosper and his creditors became troublesome. Then he pretended to have a number of large orders to fill and he secured many pounds' worth of precious stones and jewelry. These he pawned and gave the tickets to his wife. When he had raised all the money in him to and fro, sometimes his head rests on him to and ito, sometimes his head rests on the young lady who may be sitting next to him, then again it comes in contact with the window pane with such force as to make one's blood run cold.

The young man is very regular in his habits, so far as the time of taking his car and his nap is concerned. One peculiar feature is that he has never been known to this way that he could he ran away to this country. Mrs. Wieder remained in Lon-don, and when the detectives found the pawn tickets under a mattress of her bed go past his getting off place.
