

him. Do you think you could point him out in a crowd?" "If he had nothing on—or everything on his head, I said I could pick him out of hundreds."

"Then he not afraid of him. He can do you no harm. If he is here, in Leyden, you shall have a chance to point him out. Now, go you to Mr. Har's; I will be there presently. I must to Lawyer Speed's now, if mayhap I find him in."

"He crossed an open field, leaving me walking up the lane, when a woman met me. I started when she turned the corner of the lane. When she came up to me she stared at me boldly. I stared at her with open mouth."

"Fine manners, starting a body out of countenance. You will be Philip Gray's boy. You'll have a settling soon—they'll teach you to look another way when your sister gets her duds. How dare you look at me like that?"

"Now the truth was, I was not thinking of Jane Hardy at all. I had heard of her, but I had never seen her. She stooped, picked up a clod, and threw it at me, striking me in the face, saying, 'I'd do the same with your sister if I had the chance. Give her my compliments, and tell her Jane Hardy wants to know if she remembers the night she met me with as handsome a man as she ever linked arms with, and refused to speak to. Beh! She Lawyer Speed's now, if mayhap I find her before a fall.'"

"When she passed on my brain was in a whirl. Instead of staring at Jane Hardy, I was looking at her shadow. It was the same that my sister Hannah wore. And now it flashed on me suddenly that there was some mystery—some strange mistake, and that I had wronged my sister greatly, but not only did Jane Hardy's hawk look like Hannah's, but they were both of one size, and strangely alike at first glance."

"The hope that was cleared up now inspired me. I lost no time in going to the minister's house, and in five minutes more my mother and Hannah knew all I had to tell concerning Jane Hardy. Then I had my reward; my sister Hannah shed tears and laughed as she kissed me, and said she had never seen me before."

"Presently my father came in, and with him Lawyer Speed, who remained only a few minutes, talking to Hannah and Mr. Har. Then he hastened away, and I sat in the room talking around me that Hannah had a lover in Boston named Henry Moxham. His uncle was a rich merchant, and he had come to Leyden, and when he told her she was going over the sea, and would come to Leyden and marry her with my father's consent, there was he would take up a regular life. That was the reason she cried when I talked of going to sea."

"The marshal having found letters on the dead man addressed to Henry Moxham, was sure this was the young man who had made love to Hannah. His son, Preston Perkins, was taken into his father's counsel—the great seemed overwhelming. If Henry Moxham was murdered so near my father's house, and Hannah was seen near the place the body was found, unless she could tell me who killed her lover, she would hang for it."

"But as I learned long afterwards, two powerful agents were co-operating at that moment in her favor. The minister's faith in Hannah was unshaken. The moment she was asked to testify, she would hang for it. But as I learned long afterwards, two powerful agents were co-operating at that moment in her favor. marshal sat down suddenly. "You told this to the marshal. Do you come here voluntarily?" "I did not want to come—I was told I must be careful. The marshal used no threats. He simply told you it was your duty—not that the way?"

"Yes, he said over and over again that if it were his own child did it that justice should be done. He said it was his own son he would hang him."

"The careful. The marshal used no threats. He simply told you it was your duty—not that the way?" "Yes, he said over and over again that if it were his own child did it that justice should be done. He said it was his own son he would hang him."
