GENTLEMEN-I have examined several of the Kimball Pianos, and am free to admit that, after a thorough test, and that through careful analysis of the scientific as well as artistic requirements of a first-class modern musical instrument, that the Kimball Piano possesses them all to the highest degree of perfection. It appears to me that in addition to a number of new and excellent things, which I have never seen in any other instrument, Mr. Kimball has sought ought the best points of modern mechanism, and combined them, the result of which is the truly artistic piano which bears his

Below is pictured a very becoming light gray felt, ornamented with a ruche of white faille ribbon, having a small roll of corncolored velvet running through it and holding it in place. At the back on the turnedup brim there is a bow of yellow velvet and draped faille ribbon. To the right are placed two small birds with long extended

Another felt was a white one for a child.

It was bent up in front, where it was set off with a bow of white ribbon. The strings were also of white ribbon, tied under the

I claim that few women wear becoming head gear. The fault lies pot so much in head gear. The fault lies not so much in the shape as in the tone. There must be harmony between your coloring and the tones of your bonnet. You must endeavor te match your complexion. To an artist a woman's hair, eyes and coloring give out a dominant tone. It may be ashen, it may be yellow, it may be olive, it may be dead white, but anyway your headgear should harmonize and not clash with it. Having once ascertained what goes best with your peculiar coloring, then you may begin to peculiar coloring, then you may begin to experiment in forms, but not until then.

The Selection of Vells. In selecting a veil as great, if not greater, care should be employed than when buying a hat. It should be tried over the face before purchasing, for there are certain kinds that can turn a pretty woman into a positive fright, while others make a plain on very attractive looking. A blue well should only be worn by a weman of high color, for the tint has a tendency to increase one's pallor. The bordered vells, unless adjusted with great nicety, give the impression of too great length to the face. This style is gradually becoming less popular, as they are not nearly as becoming as those bought by the yard, which have no bordering and rely only on their fullness for a dainty finish. For ladies in mourning the made veils in net with a border of crepe are in many cases worn entirely to the exclusion of the longer ones that were once considered requisite to show the depth of one's grief. These long and cumbersome affairs cause genuine martyrdom for the woman who elects to wear them. They drag in the bonnet until every time they are put on one is certain of head-ache, to say nothing of the awkwardness they impose by having to be kept out of reach of every one who might by chance sit on them, thus tearing the bonnet backward while the hat pins drag up every individual hair in torturing agony.

Jetted veils are bad for the eyes, in fact Jetted veils are bad for the eyes, in fact dotted effects all are, but so long as they are fashionable women will continue to wear them, eyesight or no eyesight. Figures of any sort should be religiously eachewed as a fern leaf or butterfly, though pretty and decorative in themselves, lose all those qualities when set in the middle of a woman's forehead or on the end of her nose.

A Jaunty Sealskin Cap.

Time and fashion have had a good effect upon the sealskin cap. It was not so long ago when this cap was a clumsy, ungainly sffair, which seemed particularly adapted to fall down over one's forehead, and which always gave the observer the impression that it was four or five sizes too large for the wearer. Then its worst fault was the prominent earlans of which it boasted. Even when they were not in use they showed a tendency to become conspicuous by dropping down from beneath the cap at the most inopportune time.

The new scalakin cap has some definite shape, and is decidedly jaunty. One which was sold recently with a scalakin jacket had a rolling brim and a full indented crown. Twisted about the crown was a coil of pale valley value. In front there was of pale yellow velvet. In front there were two stiffened sealskin ears standing up very straight and lined with the pale yellow velvet. Between the cars was a tiny ani-mal's head of sealskin. The yellow gave just the correct touch of color to the turban, and in fact the only drawback to the hat was its price.

was its price. Comme Il Faut.

Warre enamel is conspicuously present in jewelry. Blue enamel, light in tint, has the next prominence.

Awore the accessories to dress that women delight in are many charming lace things, and even bodices of the new empire pattern are made entirely of lace. OLD-PASHIONED fringes, with rich passe-menteric headings, are revived. Some of them are intermixed with out-jet and iridescent beads; others are tufted with velvet, while others are enriched with gold and copper threads and cabochons.
