If he could transpose himself by omniscience, and without suffering himself, look uponthe thousands of young men who have left homes of plenty, and friends who were ready to minister to every wish and sentiment of the heart; to find that their ideal world, the city. for which they sacrificed ease and peace, was a barren, miserable desert, parching up by its heat and jostle, the fresheet unemployed spirit that ever ventured there, crushing hope, faith and often the ambition that started bravely for adventure, they would pause long and earnest ly before they left their country homes. Fatal delusion-the slender spires of the city may nse and quiver never so brightly to the sunthe wharves may be lined with white winged ships—the streets hemmed by warehouses and the great throng appear tricked up by peculiar fortuge, such is the rustic's view -but his hours of pain and agony, as he wanders from street to street, seeking some avenue to employment. when all avenues are overflown, form an actual and terrible shadow set against all he has imagined of splendor.

Young men rush into large cities, never thinking that those are the very places where the average of brains and hands have the least chance to act. They anticipate a round of intoxicating delights, they are going to be gentlemen, perchance alderman and mayors, when alas, too many, unable to bear the fierce torture of want and misfortune, and too proud to reveal in it plain manly terms, or escape it by going back to the plough, become beggars and criminals, ending their lives in alms houses or by sucide! If our admonition could reach the cars of every young man, we would urge them by their love of independence, peace, honesty, and every true weal, to stay in the country HARRIS & BLOODS' Grass scythes and scythes and every true weal, to stay in the country where they can always live and be respected. rather than venture to a city without the surest prospect of success. For more beautiful and pyous are the green fields, silvery brooks and mountain sides where the summer sun dies golden O, sons of the peasant, freest and hap plest of men-than all the artificial glare and deep hidden misery of a great city. There. you are known, thought of and cared for-here, you might perchance find a friend, but you will search long for him. There, when death comes, will be green turf and fresh flowers in the church yard, and many sad hearts to lay you down to the last sleep-here, neither tolling bell nor fearful eyes mark your loss. We say this of all cities, and of all ordinary life in them; Stay then in the country if you have but bread and water, and a straw couch to rest your head on.-N. F. Sun.
