Steaming Food for Stock.

A "practical farmer," a correspondent of the Germania Telegraph, furnishes the following information, upon a subject of much interest to each farmer.

Much has been said and written of late by farmers of steaming food for stock. Two which have been prominently presented in my mind are those of the German and the French. In the former, the food is steamed in a large boiler, and the steam is used to heat the water in which the food is cooked. In the latter, the food is steamed in a large boiler, and the steam is used to heat the water in which the food is cooked.

During the past winter I had many loads of cattle and horses, and fed them during the winter on steamed hay and straw. I got the steamed hay, and with it withered straw. After that time, finding my cows got in low condition, I used half straw and half hay, and gave the feeding of a foddering of hay in winter and night. As they calved, I had a lot of hay to feed to them. With this and my cows grew fat, and I can milk as well as I ever remember them to have done.

Comparing his consumption of hay in this former year, he calculated he had saved thirty tons of straw, which supplied his place, reckoning hay at 31.10s. and straw at 11.5s. would amount to 671.10s., while the expense of cutting and steaming amounted to less than 51.

By steaming, we do not change the nature of the food submitted to the process; it does not convert poor fodder into rich; its chief action and design is to render a greater percentage of the nutritive principles contained in the mass digestible. The principle of steam is beneficial simply from the fact that by its minute division every particle of the substance is exposed to the juices of the stomach. In hay there is much nutritious matter, which escapes without contributing to the benefit of the animal, as its fibrous and hard texture prevents its being thoroughly broken up by mastication.

Could we devise some method, whereby the division of these substances used as food for animal could be commonly and cheaply effected, a very great saving would be secured; but this is not possible in all cases. By using hay and straw, a better method of feeding is secured, and the animal is kept in better health.

Feeding Fowls. In a good fowling season, it is not only profitable, but also a pleasure to rear a flock of fowls. The first thing to be done is to select a good breed, and to keep them in good health.

It is a good plan to have a few fowls in the house, as they will be ready to hand for any emergency. They will also be a great help in the kitchen, as they will supply you with fresh eggs.

When you are rearing fowls, it is important to keep them in good health. This can be done by giving them a good diet, and by keeping them in a clean and healthy environment.
