Time as a Manure.

To speak of time as a manure, may perhaps start those who deny it the possession of any fertilizing quality, yet as it is a constituent, not only of all soil but of all the plants in a greater or less degree, we may, consider it as feeding and assisting vegetable growth, and thus acting as a manure.

How it acts, and in what way it conduces to the production of fertility, has long been misunderstood, and many theories have been advanced, not only fanciful but fallacious. That large quantities are useful, or that by the application of lime alone, fertility can be kept up, have become exploded ideas. It is now considered to act both by chemical combination and directly decomposing the most matter both vegetable and mineral for which it has affinities, and entering actually into the composition of the plants, as proved by chemical analysis. The ash of wheat plant contains 6 per cent, that of the pea, 14, while the ash of the oak 32 per cent., or is composed of nearly one third pure lime.

Lime has been found essential to the grasses and grain plants, by stimulating the productive energies of the soil—and by its efficient action in the production and preparation of the elements of vegetable fertility. It does this when properly applied, by accelerating the decomposition of all dead vegetable and substances—by neutralizing the free acids of the soil, and thus discouraging the growth of coarse, noxious weeds, and promoting that of the grasses. Under a favorable concurrence of moist, moisture and heat, it induces the formation of nitrate, imparts warmth to the soil, and increases its power of absorption—causes to render still soils friable, and gives consistency to sandy ones. It imparts to its electric force, fermentation and ultimate decay in inert matters, causing carbonic acid to be evolved, and nitrogeous gases to be discharged, thereby countering that which was before unavailable, into active sources of vegetable nutriment.

Lime, clover and manure, are parts of that rotation of which wheat is the product, and, like a problem in proportion, we must have three numbers given to be sure of the fourth. The elements of the soil which go to form the grain, must be returned again in some shape, or they will finally be exhausted, and profitable production will cease.

Applied directly to our summer fallows, at the rate of 40 to 50 lbs. per acre, lime can be said to prove beneficial, but if there be any want of this constituent in the soil, its application proves especially valuable. Some prefer applying it in small quantities to the land when in grass—others compost it with muck, and applying it to any crop in rotation. Lime should never be mixed with barn-yard manure directly, as it decomposes it, and evolves the gases—dismissing its most valuable qualities. But muck becomes manure by fermentation, which mixture with lime produces. Prof. Johnston proposes a mixture of salt and lime—of three bushels of shell lime, hot from the kiln, with one of common salt, which forms chloride of lime, and carbonate of soda, more genial in their action than either alone. Four bushels of this mixture, with one coal of muck, will fully decompose it, forming at the end of a month, in warm weather, a most valuable manure.

Lime also acts mechanically when applied in the state of a carbonate, rendering heavy soils loose and friable—acting for a long time, both chemically and mechanically. Its effects may be seen for twenty years after its application, in the lightness and fertility of the soil which obtains it.

Its effect is greatest when applied to the surface, as it is not of a volatile character, and when below the manures applied, its decomposing power is inferior. The latter are primary, the former secondary in the character of the benefits they administer. In the use of lime, says the veteran editor of the American Farmer, whose language we quote in a previous paragraph—"Its full benefit can only be realized, where due attention is paid to the application of animal and vegetable manure—where a judicious system, a proper rotation of crops, is practiced, and the culture of clover and grasses forms an element in such system. As lime must be furnished with the raw material to work up into the food of plants, and clover, or some other green crop, must be grown and plowed in every third and fourth year." Thus it will be seen, that practical and scientific knowledge and experience, in this as in all other operations upon the farm, conduce much to the most profitable and judicious use of lime as a manure.

THE PROPER MODE OF FEEDING CATTLE.

An English writer observes that two great points in feeding cattle is a regularity and a particular care of the weaker individuals. On this last account there ought to be plenty of food, so that too many may not feed together, in which very common case the weaker are not only trampled down by the stronger, but they are worried, and become enervated and spiritless—than which there cannot be a more unfavorable state for them. Besides they are ever compelled to fight with the worst of the fold. This domineering spirit, is so remarkably prevalent among horned cattle, that the wrier has a hundred times observed, the weaker beasts running down the ditch, and absolutely neglecting their own sustenance for the sake of driving the wrier before them. This is much often than suspected the chief source of that difference in size of beasts after a winter's keep. It is likewise, he says, a very common and a very shameful sight, to see a dairy of cows, to see several of them gored and wounded in a dozen places, merely from the inattention of the owner, and the neglect of cupping the horns of those that bore. The weaker animals should be kept apart, and in crib feeding in the yard, it is a good method to tie up the masters of their meals. Dr. Dean says there should be more yards than one to the barn where diverse sorts of cattle are kept. The sheep should have a yard by themselves, at least, and the young stock, another, that they may be wholly confined to such fodder as the farmer can afford them.—Edinburgh Journal.

Very Strange but true.

A Gentleman of a simple name, N. Y., has obtained from the Witch-hazel, a unique remedy, which lays a more just claim to the name of "family cure" than any medicine we have ever before known. Nothing is connected with it but a little Alcohol to preserve it, and yet it acts with great certainty in removing pain and all irritation, curing all rheumatism, sprains, bruises and lacerations, rapidly. It cures, however, cholera-morbus, hemorrhage, ear-ache, tooth-ache, sore eyes, and all various affections. It is white as water and as harmless, and it is called "Pond's Pain Destroyer and Healing Extract."
None is genuine except "Pond's Extract" is blown in the bottle. Mr. Pond first introduced this medicine to the public and has expended a vast deal of time and money in bringing it to a high state of perfection, and we now warrant every bottle to give relief.

A man by the name of Spencer has put forth an article called "The Coyle Extract," which claims to be from the Witch-hazel. If from the shrub, its name is a perfect deception, and it is a very imperfect article; he not deceived, get a pamphlet and see.
