Particulars of the Sinking of the Steamer Lowell-Fifteen Lives Lost, &c.

We yesterday received from a gentleman wise was present in the dreadful mone attending the continuous between the stemmer Lowell and S. F. Vincion, both of which were at the time heavily laden the following particulars;—The accident took place near Captain Island, ten miles below Wheeling, at all-past 10 o'clock at night. The night was very durk; and as soon as the plant of the boats for ceived each other the bells were tapped; but through some unfortunate mistake or accident the Lowell ran across the bow of the Vinton, which struck her all of her boilers. The Vinton was a large boat, carrying about 900 tons, and has proba-The Lowell sank in about thirty seconds after the collision. The cabin was parted from the hall and

The names of the firemen and deck passengers are unknown, they having been taken on board at Pittaburgh, and the clerk not having entered their names on the register. A large tamily, consisting of a man, his wife, and children, from Bedford, Pa., on their way West, were among those who perished.

The captain of the Vinton immediately ordered that the boat be stopped, and he then towed the wreck of the Lowell's cabin to the shore, where everything that could contribute to the comfort of everything that could contribute to the comfort of those, saved was done. After some time, the steamer Messenger No. 2 came along side, and Captain Fisher, of the M., kindly took a number of the passengers on his boat to Canadanati. Joseph B. Again has the circle of our young friends been broken by the hand of death, and a bright link taken away. Again are we called upon to mourn the departure of a dear one, and to sorrow over the tomb of youth and hope. In the death of Pamelia the mourning family have lost a blessed treasure, and the grave has won the idol of many hearts. Oh! who could fathom the anguish of that widowed mother's spirit when the Angel of death entered ber happy dwelling and laid his cold hand upon the brow of her beautiful and much-loved daughten: Who could tell the burden of grief that lay upon the hearts of brothers and sisters as they stood by the bed-side and watched the life-light fade from those eyes, and the palor of death steal over that fond countenance. It does really seem as if the loveliest and brightest things of earth were destined the soonest to decay. Bur a few days ago the rose of health bloomed on Pamelia's cheeks, and the love-light sparkled in her eye. How many a bright vision of earthly happiness had that young spirit conjured up to gild her futurehow many a radiant hope lit up her life path with its starry gleamings. But the visions have faded n the darkness of the tomb, and the light of her hopes has gone out. Yes, she has left us !-Those eyes that once beamed with sweet smiles are now closed in death-those hands that oft so warmly pressed a friend are now clasped in one long, cold embrace, and the music of her lips is silent. But we know that she has gone where her forehead is starred With the beauty that dwell in her soul— Whereathe light of her, lovehiness cannot be misred; Nor the heart be flung back from its goal.
