The de we and rains in falling, bring with them Ammonia and Carbonic acid gas, both necessary to the growing plants. The water passes through the mulch into the soil, and is protected from being evaporated by the direct influence of the sun by the mulch and thus the soil is continually storing up these gauses and retaining them for the use of plants, in addition to which, the wa'er itself is held in the soil instead of evaporation from the sur

In extreme hot weather, the evaporation of the solight quantity of moisture held by the mulch from its upper surface, cools the ground below and prevents the ill affect arising from excessive heat, while in cooler weather this effect is lessened as the evaporation is less./ This phenomena may be thus unilerstood :- As budies increase in size their capacity for heat increase in like proportion.

Thus; if we wet our head with a quantity of water (say I cubic inch) and then fan it, the water in 1700 times, and in so doing will recieve 1700 times as much heat as was contained in the water before its evaporation, and this heat being abstracted from the nearest hot object, the head, leaves it cool .-Water may be cooled by wrapping a wet cloth outride a jug and placing it in a draft of air; the evaporation of the water from the cloth cools the water in the jug by abstracting its heat. Ice may be made by evaporating either from the surface of water.

During the autumn, while the large amounts of both vegetable and animal matters are undergoing decay, the atmosphere is highly charged with fertilizing gases, and the mulched lands readily receives these gases. Clayey soils are prevented from baking and cracking by summer heat, white sandy soil retain their moisture, and many weeds die out for want of the direct action of the sun.

During winter the mulch answers another purpose The immediate surface being partially protected from frost, permits falling showers to percelute below the surface before freezing, and hence the spaces between surface particles are not filled with ice so as to prevent the ammonia from melting snows from entering the soil, at the same time the surface not being over-charged with moisture does not heave by freezing, and the crops are not thrown

Many farmers spread manures in in the fall and plow them under in the spring, and thus mistake the effect produced by the fibrous matter contained in the manure acting as a mulch, for the direct action of the soluble parts of manure. Such practice is wrong; a slight mulching of comparatively valpeless materials would be equally effective, as most lost by evaporation, and only the benefit as a mulch result from such practice. It manufes are used in the fall, they should be plowed deeply under, and mulching may be applied in addition, if necessary, or the land may be mulched during winter and manured in spring. The application of mulch around fruit trees is much restored to in Massachusetts and elsewhere, and with material benefit in causing early fruiting and supply of moisture. The full benefit can only be derived, by mulching lands which are free from standing water in excess, and it is for this reason that under-drained and sub-soil lands repay the farmer so will for STUBBLE, SWARD, SUB-SOIL & other PLOWS, mulching. The following article is from The Ger- DOG POWERS FOR HURNS, KENDALL'S muntown Telegraph.-ED.

Shade as a Fertilizer .- A good article on this subject by J. B. Garber. It is an asiablished fact in agriculture, that the protection of the ground against the extreme heat of summer and extreme cold of winter, is of essential benefit to it, showing itself tage of " mulching" young trees, as well as rasp. COK, PARLOR & OTHER in increased growth and production. Of the advanberry and vine borders, by the application of any decomposable substance, as straw, long manure, leaves, grass, cornstalks, &c. &c., every gardener and nurseryman is aware. The object, however, of Mr. Garber, is to show that shading farming ground, somewhat after the same fashion, is equally beneficial, and in proof of it, gives us the following experiment:

"Having a large quantity of wheat straw for which I had neither use, nor room for storage, I, in last January, concluded to draw it on a field that it is lanuary, concluded to draw it on a field that either here, or on application by mail post-paid.

RAYMOND M. WELLES. had been laid down to grass, timothy and clover two years previously. The field contained about ten acres, and we spread over the ground as evenly as we could, some 12 or 15 two-horse loads. It was regarded at the time by many persons, as a novelally believed to be advantageous. This spring it kinds of BLACKSMITHING upon ressonable terms. could plainly be seen to have the effect of starting the grass earlier than in fields adjacent, and causing it to grow with great vigor. I am fully convinced, that straw spread over the ground at the commencement of winter would in a great measure prevent the frost from heaving, or lifting the soil, which from the alternate freezing and thawing, frequently occasions the distruction of wheat, clover, &c., the frost drawing the plants out of the ground, and leaving them exposed on the surface. A large covering of straw would in a great measure prevent
