Farm Work for March.

March has long been noted for irregularity. Its morning promises are followed by evening jilts and flurries. Snow, rain and hail follow in mad succession ; and the wind at length comes in to settle all disputes and give direction to the elements.

Like Napoleon the Third, it raises the highest flag and for a time puts to silence all the powers that were warring against each other. But let not farmers war against a March wind. No doubt it has good and bad qualities mingled together. Winds purify the atmosphere, and when we can have high winds better than in March ?

Winds in April and May interrupt the sower. In June and July they prostrate corn and grain. In August and September they shake our fruit trees too hard. And as to October and November all farmers say the high winds do more harm than good.

Let us not complain then of the high March winds, but take advantage of them to turn mills where there are no waterfalls, and to do up all the chores in sheltered alcoves and on sunny sides.

As we have had but little snow this winter we must rely on wheels to bring home our wood and saw-logs, unless we are prepared to take advantage of the first snows that come. In Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine, the farmers have had good sledding for several weeks, and as usual, we presume, have hauled up a year's supply of wood to be cut up and split and piled in March-wind or no wind.

Meanwhile the cattle must be strictly attended to. Regular feeding is always important. If you feed at nine this evening, your cattle will expect you to feed them at nine next evening-but you may do better in letting them lie and sleep through the night than to disturb their slumbers by offering more food.

In the month of March and April, we expect our cows to have ca'ves. March is a good month in which to record the births of calves that are to be raised ; and it is not a good practice to let cows come in during mid-winter, for they will not be so productive of milk and butter through the summer.

Farmers, whose chief object is milk, are in the practice of letting their cows calve in Autumn, as this is the only mode of keeping up a supply through the Winter ; but the stockbreeders are to pursue a different course. They want Spring calves for raising, as young cattle should always shed their coats in the Spring ; and they will when they are a year old at that season.

Calves are more thrifty and better formed when they are permitted to suck for two or three months, and they are very easily weaned at that time, in case they have had access to a little oat-meal placed in a trough in their pen. If they are shy of oats or oat-meat, place a green sod, or some loam, in the trough and mix it with the meal. Calves learn very soon to lick up oat-meal-or oats-or Indian meal mixed with either. Bat oats or oat-meal are less likely to injure calves than clear Indian meal. Recollect that loam is the best remedy for scours,

Rocks that have been dug and piled in heaps may be drawn off to the line where they are to be laid into wall though there may be but little snow in the pastures. Sleighs with broad wooden shoes are the very implements which we want for this purpose. Loads are easily put on and rolled off. And now when the sun has melted off the snow from the heaps, the work of hauling them to place is as agreeable as any that is done out doors.

Good farmers will yoke up their steers often nd use them gently. The but end of a whip

Calves should never be tied up in stalls ; let them run together in loose pens and have a trough above the manger, to put the meal and cut roots in. Recollect that fresh loam is the very best remedy for scours in calves and that Ploughman.

TO DESTROY LICE ON CATTLE, &c. - Messrs. Editors : In one of your papers, some one inquires for the best means of keeping lice from cattle and horses. I can tell him how to do it effectually :

My father was a good farmer in olden times. But his cattle and colts would sometimes get lousy. Being the youngest son, it was made my business to take care of the calves and young colts, and see them safely through the Winter. To keep lice from them I tried a decoction of tobacco, applied to their backs and necks. I never failed. I then tried Scotch snuff, sifted on their backs. That also proved equally efficacions, and was more convenient than the first experiment. But on examination I found that all the cattle and colts that were in the habit of standing before the barndoor whilst the grain was being winnowed, and became all covered by the chaff dust were never lousy. I then tried sifting the chaff dust upon the calves, and found it as effectual as tobacco in any form. Since that time, I have sifted upon the calves dry, fine dust from the streets. and find that equally as efficacious as either of the other experiments. Hens and chickens are apt to get lousy when kept in a close pen where they can have no convenient place to scratch in the dry dirt. But give them a chance to scratch and roll in the dry dirt, and they will never be troubled with lice. J. L. EDGER TON, Waverly, N. Y .- Country Gentleman.

MANURE MAXIMS .- At a late meeting of the Farmer's Club of the American Institute. Mr. T. W. FIELD read a paper on manures, in which he said :

The whole subject of manures may be stated in this proposition :--

1. Manure does not waste so long as it is unfermented, or undissolved, and these conditions may be effected by drying or saturation.

2. Fresh manure, is unfit for food or plants.

3. Fermenting manure, in contact with inert matter, has the power of neutralizing vicious properties, such as the taunic acid of peat, and making it a fertilizer.

4. Manure wastes in two ways-the escape of gas and the discolving of its soluble salts.
