Plowing for Wheat.

MR. EDITOR :- It may be difficult in these times, when one-half the people are either preachers or lawyers and the other half politicians, to call the attention of any considerable number of them to a subject which bears directly upon their business and interests .-

Yet I will venture the experiment. In preparing ground for wheat, it has for-merly been the practice to "summer fallow" it-that is, break it up in June-turning under a fair crop of grass or clover for decompo sition; then, immediately before sowing to turn it all up again to the action of the sun and air-thus exposing to waste, by evaporation and otherwise, much of the sustenance designed for the plant. And some farmers, as though fearing the work of improvement had third time before seeding. The consequence of such superabundant and wasteful labor was, that nearly all the vegetable matter put beneath the surface at the first plowing and designed as food for the plant, made its escape warmth of the soil consequent upon frequent stirring, and the presence of extremely volatile food stimulated a fair growth in the fall, but when the time came for making the kernel, which is the great desideratum in wheat growing, the plant was found enfeebled for the want of the nutriment, which, the fall previous had been "wasted on the desert air." An imperfect and light berry was usually obtained. Much of the failure in wheat growing may be traced to this system of "summer fallowing."

When farmers will learn that their plants have not teeth wherewith to masticate their food, and that therefore, before they can absorb it and appropriate it to their growth and development, it must undergo decomposition and assume that gaseous form in which it can allowed the summer fallowing. The summer fallowing and assume that gaseous form in which it can allowed the summer fallowing and assume that gaseous form in which it can allowed the summer fallowing. Calves, about weaning time, are apt to get to lousy, if not in high condition Look to this, 1 and if any be found, apply the remedies we published page 279 of last volume, which will prove effectual. That is : rub on the lousy places, a little soft grease mixed with a sprinkling of common Scotch snuff, which will cause the lice to leave at once. If you have not the snuff, the grease alone will do. The lice take up their abode on poor animals where there is not an abundance of natural oil exuded.

As the season progresses, feed them green corn-stalks, finely cut up if necessary. Pumpkins, when ripe, are capital food for calves ; green turnips, beet, and carrot tops, or any other green food they will eat. And so they should progress till ready to go into Winter quarters. A good three-year-old calf which has grown right along from the time of its birth without check or hindrance, will be worth two poor, stunted things. One comes ont a fine cow, bull or bullock, while the others are pinched, deformed by poverty, and unsatisfactory altogether.

We have raised hundreds of calves, and in all sorts of ways. A third less pure milk drawn from the teat by the calf, is quite as good as the full quantity milked by hand, and then fed the calf. We know this by trial .-Sucking is the natural way-feeding is not. But in feeding, skimmed milk and other tood may be added, answering good purposes, and rearing the calf at less expense .- American Agriculturist.

RATS - Agricultural writers estimate that every rat eats and destroys on an average, one pint of grain, or its equivalent in other food, per week.

A farmer who has been troubled with this species of vermin, calculates that, on an average every farmer in the State of Pennsylvania (taking that State as a sample) supports ten rats on his premises. Ten rats, at a pint each per week would consume eight bushels of grain per year; or, take 150,000 as the number of farmers in the State, one million two hundred thousand bashels annually to support the rats of Pennsylvania; a very considerable contribution towards the maintenance of a nuisance.

A tubful of soapsuds, farmers should remember, is worth as much as a wheelbarrow offered. of good manure. Every bucket of soapsuds should not be lost. The garden is a convenient place in which to dispose of it; but around the roots of grape-vines, young trees, or anything of the sort, will do as well.
