Management of the Horse.

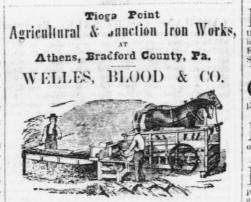

In our remarks on this subject, last mouth, we spoke of the importance of the cleanliness and ventilation of stables. Hardly less important is the cleanliness of the horse himself .-That the animal prefers a neat skin to a dirty one, is manifest from his treatment of himself when out to pas'ure. By rubbing against fences and trees and by rolling on the grass, he keeps his hair in tolerable neatness ; it is often more tidy and glossy than when under the care of the groomsman. He can not curry and brush himself to any amount in the stable hence he is obliged to lie down in whatever filth his untidy owner suffers to remain beneath EMERY'S PATENT RAILROAD HORSE POWERS him

A stabled horse should be cleaned every day. And this, not only for the sake of the neatness itself, but for the benefit of the friction to the horse's health. Many stabled horses are not worked or exercised regularly, and they conse-admirably. Our new quently need to have their skin rubbed daily in quently need to have their skin rubbed daily in order to open the pores, and to promote a good circulation of the blood to the extremities.— This bege's a gentle heat and perspiration, and produces a glo-sy coat of hair. It is not a neat practice to groom a horse in his stall.— Much of the dirt and dust rubbed out of his hair, falls back upon him or settles on the sides of his stall and in his manger. The horse should be taken into some open, airy place in the barn near the door, or even out of doors is bitter, so that the scarf and dust may blow the barn near the door, or even out of doors saving stary experiently. is bitter, so that the sent and dust may blow We invite the particular attention of Farmers and Dealaway, and the horse himself enjoy the benefit ers to our of exposure to the fresh air This is also a TIOGA-POINT FEED CUTTERS, GALE'S PATENT.

of exposure to the fresh air This is also a much neater method for the groomsman him-self. Is not the currycomb used with more se-verity than either needful or humane ? Some kinds of dirt adhere so obstinately to the skin, that this implement must be used with some degree of harshness to remove them. But, as a general rule, it should be used lightly, es-pectally on the legs and other tender parts of the body. Some horses, too, are very thin-skinned and sensitive, and must be treated ac-cordingly. After the currycomb has been gently passed over the surface, nothing is bet-ter than rubbing with a large wisp of pen-straw. ter than rubbing with a large wisp of pea-straw. Rub, from one extremity of the animal to the other. This may be followed by the ordinary brush or a hair-cloth. When this is done, it Is a good plan to give the legs a good rubbing with the hand. It brings down swellings, softens stiffnesses, and makes the legs warm and trim.

2. Erercise .- Farm horses seldom need more exercise than they get in the ordinary labors of the farm. Their work is regular, and not exhansting. Like the farmer himself, they have enough to do to promote their health, without being at one time enervated by idleness, and at another overcome by excessive labors. It is the horse of the mechanic, merchant, editor, minister and lawyer, who often needs artificial exercise. Sometimes, he stands idle in his sta-ble for days and weeks in succession, and then is worked or driven to the top of his strength, for the same length of time. His food is often continued the same in kind and amount whether continued the same in kind and amount whether at work or resting. No horse can be treated at work or resting. No horse can be treated so, without more or less injury. By standing idle, he is quite sure to contract the 'scratches, or fever, or some of the many diseases of feet and legs. By being hard driven after idleness, Earge sizes up to 60 inch, always on hand and sold a Factory Prices. Particular attention paid to orders b he is quite sure to get inflammation of the lungs mail or of the feet. The horse, like his master, needs daily exercise. The amount may vary, from one hour to four, without any damage. This exercise will keep up his digestion and his appetite, preserve the health of his lungs, eyes feet, limbs, and, in short, of his whole system. Then, when circumstances require extra labor, he can perform it with comparative ease, and without injury to himself. 3. Food.-For the horse roaming in the pas

Observation and experience will teach more on this point than can be learned from books.

this point than can be learned from books. The old practice of allowing a horse to stand day and night, before a rack or manger full of hay, is coming to be discarded. It has been found that in this way, horses distend their stomachs by over-eating, and besides, waste a good deal of hay by pulling it from the rack, picking out the sweetest stalks and throwing tunder their feet. When hay is fed, it shellad under their feet. When hay is fed, it sholad best condition for fodder in about ten months or a year. It has then gone through the process of fermentation and its sweet and nutritious properties are fully developed.

Cut feed is considered by many the best form in which hay or straw can be given to horses. If chopped fine and mixed with grain or meal little or nothing is wasted, and the food is quickly disposed of. This last item is one of considerable importance for hard working horses. By limiting their food at one time-say, at night, after a day's work-to a manger fall of good cut-feed and grain, as soon as this eaten, they can lie down and rest ; whereas, by the old method of feeding grain, and a rack full of hay, much time is spent in eating, which should have been given to resting .-There is a gain of at least two hours' rest every night.
