As it is the time of year when we are much occupied with manures, we repro duce some useful hints, for which we are indebted to a practical man whose experience has authorized him to give his opinions. It will be observed that he economizes and preserves in the best manner the manure from horses, cattle sheep, hogs, poultry, all under a uniform system of nanagement. While exceptions may be cannot be denied that on the whole it deserves high commendation:

First, the horse stable is kept well littered with dry leaves, applied, sometimes, as often as once a week; and others, only once a fortnight. When the stalls get experiments by weighing, have long since about twelve inches deep in manure, they ascertained that animals in fine condition are emptied by first throwing the manure will lay on more flesh for the amount of into the stable passage with the dung forks, food eaten than those of inferior character. and then carrying it in wheel-barrows in Hence shrewd men will not purchase learn an adjoining shed, to remain until wanted for the land. This removal and spreading fact serves to establish the truth that all checks the fermentation and consumption animals at all stages of growth should be by fire fang, to which stable manure is li- kept fleshy. To the objection made to penning on the same spot throughout the year it is answered that sheep are not safe from dogs light, sunshine, exercise and cleanliness in the fields or in the hurdles, but are safe in a lot immediately adjoining the other stock. It is also objected that the labor moving the pens and hurdles during the busy season makes it liable to be neglec-Into the horse lot, which is also littered, barley meal to a fine steer, gave a weekly increase in weight averaging 18 pounds. A neighbor advised him to push him, and eight quarts were accordingly fed daily. The weekly increase of flesh was less than when he received four quarts. The amount being increased to twelve quarts per day, ne gained nothing at all. Several similar instances have come to our knowledge, and among others a fine animal was recently fed by a neighbor a peck or more of rich meal per day After thus urging on the fattening process as he supposed, for several weeks, he was finally sold and proved taken to some points of his practice, it to be only a few pounds heavier than when purchased.
