AN IMPORTANT DECISION FROM THE SU-PERINTENDANT OF COMMOM SCHOOLS

The common school laws of the State fix the eligibility of pupils for admission to those schools at from six to twenty-one years of age, providing that a Pennsylvania boy or girl can, if desired, attend school for fifteen years. When the slave-holders' war me was precipitated, there were hundreds of able-bodied boys between the ages of seventeen and twenty-one who entered the armies, fought well and greatly distinguished themselves. Many of these were left to occupy graves on fields made immortal by their valor. Others have returned home disabled for life, and still others, having passed through all the perils of battle, came back to us unharmed. Many of the ANDREW G. CURTIN. minors thus escaping the dangers of the war, became of age in the army, and since their return, are desirous of entering the public schools to finish their education But the strict letter of the law forbids the admission to any public school of a man over twenty-one years old ; and if the law were rigidly adhered to, hundreds of young men in the State, among whom are a number of helpless cripples, would be de prived of that education for which the munificence of the Commonwealth has provided

Some time since this subject was formally brought to the attention of the Superintendent of Common Schools, on the abplication of a discharged soldier, who had reached his majority in the service of his country, to enter a public school. After a careful examination of the subject, Superintendant Coburn has decided that by every principal of right and equity all who volunteered and became of age in the army, are entitled to a term of years or months in the public schools equal to that which they served in the army. Thus, if a two years in the army, he may, if he desire, spend two years in the public schools. the renewal of the Reciprocity treaty .- Superintendent argues that the country had
