Ringbone, as its name indicates, consists of a ring or circle of bony matter extending round the cornet. Most commonly it is laid down around the lower part of the large pastern bone, but in all bad cases the small pastern bone is likewise involved. The swelling is very distinctive, and can hardly be mistaked for anything else. It is hard and unyielding, and although at first occuring in separate points, it gradually extends round the sides and front of the coronet .-Sometimes it passes downwards, implicating the latteral cartilages, and constituting sidebone. It is always apt to increase, especially when the horse continues at work on the load, and sometimes becomes of large size, interfering with the movements of the joints. Out of the 150 ossific diseases in the region of the fetlock, Mr. Percival found sixty-three cases of complete anchylosis, including five of the fetlock joint, forty of the pastern joint, and eighteen of the coffin joint; whilst the remainder consisted of bony incrustations of various degrees of severity. When the horse is much used on the stones during the early development of ringbone, the fetlock is apt to become hot and tender, and the animal goes lame. In the large proportion of cases the bony matter, however, is laid down gradually without causing much pain or any notable lameness. A certain degree of stiffness is, however, usually observable. Whether caus- CAPITAL ing lameness or not, ringbone constitutes unsoundness. As it is apt to be herditary, animals with such exostoses should be avoided for breeding purposes avoided for breeding purposes.

Like most other bony deposits, ringbones generally result from concussion. this is frequent or continued, inflamation is set up in the periosteum and underlying bone, giving rise to the outpouring of plastic lymph, which is gradually converted in-The jar is obviously greatest where the pasterns are short and upright and underbred animals of such conformation furnish a large proportion of cases of ringbone. It is common, in the fore limbs of heavy horses, and of high-stepping back and carriage horses; but it likewise occurs in the hind limbs particularly of the lighter description of horses. Prof. Spooner states that horses with small feet are especially subject to ringbone. From a blow, tread, or other such injury, inflemmation of the periosteum is sometimes established, leading, like the concussion of hard work, to bony deposits. When depending upon such cases, ringbone is apt to be confined to one limb. A deposit of bone once formed, cannot be removed by any treatment short of excision. When, therefore an old ringbone has become hard and unyielding it had better be left alone, especially if it be free from tenderness, and does not cause a lameness. Irritants may re-excite inflamation, and increase the evil. A ringbone of recent growth, in which the newly, formed deposit greatly reduced by simple remedies. Any tenderness of heat should be compatted by greatly reduced by simple remedies. Any tenderness of heat should be combatted by soothing measures, such as cold wet slabs, total immunity from work, a half dose of opening medicine, and laxative cooling diet. After a few days, when the parts are becoming cool, some ointment of the red odine of mercury should be well rubbed in, and the blister repeated several times at intervals of a week or ten days. Firing is often resorted to, but has the disadvantage of blemishing, and is not more effectual than the iodide of mercury ointment. After the first day's rest, unless the limb is hot and tender, moderate farm work on the soft land will do no harm. When the horse goes to work, his shoes must be light and nicely fitted; whilst the jar may besides be somewhat abated by the use of leather soles English paper.
