For the New York Observer. Unsound Hores and Hard Driving.

In this age of steamboats, railroads and electricity, when people, in their frantic madness, must be whirled with the speed of the swiftest rail-car up the mountain, or down the precpice, a perfectly sound horse is an animal of rare occurrence. Horses cannot keep pace with a steam-car; but men are they are able to endure. Consequently, their wind fails; their lungs are injured, and they fall an easy prey to the many diseases which are most sure to follow. The farmer with the store of the many diseases which are most sure to follow. the many diseases which are most sure to follow. The farmer who has fat and young horses, which are calculated for plowing and heavy work, sees the fleet carriage-hors-pass him, when they are both travelling on the same road, and he "whips up," thinking "it will not hurt his fat team to move a little fietter." FARM IMPROVEMENT .- In regard to broken-down stager? It is true that horses sometimes inherit unsoundness. Yet, as a general rule, it can be traced directly to improper management.—Moderate driving, every day, with proper care in feeding, watering, and protection from old storms of winter, would prolong the lives of good horses to such a degree that they would finally die with old age.
