The approaching census of 1860 was to disclose to the South the great disparity in the growth and population of the respective sections. None knew better than they the lessons de ducible from that disparity; one of which was that, except by some wonderful political legerdemain, the scep-tre of power in the Federal Government was hereafter to be wielded by the North. Their efforts to secure slave territory in Mexico and Central America had proved a failure. The Dred Scott decision had proven abortive by their defeat in Kansas. The reopening of the slave trade could not be mide available without the acquisition of Cuba as the entrepot from which to distribute into the territories. These nicely laid schemes having all been defeated by Northern sagacity and firmness; the power of the Democratic party in the free States having been broken by the light of intelligence imparted to the people through free schools, free pulpits and Methodist stump speakers, the South was ready for separation by rebellion.

Without so much as putting forth to the world a bill of rights, or setting forth a list of grievances, they com-mitted several clear and positive acts of war, and then fired upon Fort Sumter.
