

Agricultural.
Wheat on the River Front
Professor Voeckler, in a recently published and valuable report on this subject, arrives at the conclusions which we epitomize below. They are the result of very careful studies and experiments, and must command the attention of all interested in wheat culture. Whatever may be said of these particular conclusions, there can be no doubt of the acceptability of the general one in favor of clover, as furnishing the elements most needed for a good growth of wheat.

1. A good crop of clover removed from the soil more potash, phosphoric acid, lime, and other matters which enter into the composition of the ashes of our cultivated crops, than any other crop usually grown in this country [England].

2. There is fully three times as much nitrogen in a crop of clover as in the average produce of the grain and straw of wheat per acre.

3. Notwithstanding the large amount of nitrogenous matter, and of ash constituents of plants, in the produce of an acre, clover is an excellent preparatory crop for wheat.

4. During the growth of clover, a large amount of nitrogenous matter accumulates in the soil.

5. This accumulation, which is greatest in the surface soil, is due to decaying leaves dropped during the growth of clover, and to an abundance of roots, containing, when dry, from 1 1/2 to 2 per cent. of nitrogen.

6. The clover roots are stronger and more numerous, and more likely to fall on the ground, when it is mown for hay; in consequence, more nitrogen is left after clover seed than after hay, which accounts for wheat yielding a better crop after clover seed than after hay.

7. The development of roots being checked when produce, in a green condition, is fed off by sheep, in all probability leaves still less nitrogenous matter in the soil than when clover is allowed to get ripe and mown for hay. No doubt as to the correctness of the observation made by practical men, that notwithstanding the return of the produce in the sleep excrement, wheat is generally stronger, and yields better, after clover mown for hay, than after the clover is off green by sheep.

8. The nitrogenous matter in the clover remains, on its gradual decay, and finally transformed, into nitrates, thus affording a continuous source of food for the cereal crops, especially of wheat.

9. There is strong presumptive evidence that the nitrogen which exists in the air in the shape of ammonia and nitric acid, descends in chemical combinations in the form of rain, which falls on the ground, satisfies, under ordinary circumstances, the requirements of the clover crop. This crop causes a large accumulation of nitrogenous matters, which are gradually changed the soil into nitrates. The atmosphere thus furnishes nitrogenous food to the succeeding wheat indirectly, and so to say, gratis.

10. Clover not only provides abundance of nitrogenous food, but delivers the food in a readily available form (as nitrates) more gradually and continuously, and consequently, with more certainty of a good result, than such food can be applied to the land in the shape of nitrogenous spring top-dressings.—Hearth and Home.

Farm Horses.—Depend upon it, some good, active, powerful English cart horses would make a vast improvement in the way of light mares which do the work on the farm at the present day. It is not expected any of this cross, sired by horses weighing from a ton to twenty-five hundred pounds, would retain all the size and much strength, and would be fast enough for any purpose besides racing, and the course is likely to be discontinued by business men ere long. The fact is, when farm draught carts are small, if the plowing is done deep, there is too much strength on the line, or the poor over-worked animals that there is on those whose weight alone will almost move all the other cart with continued effort.

The cart horse in England was formerly too clumsy a beast, having hair on the legs as long as on an ordinary mare, but the improvement of the last generation has given a quick step and clearer legs, still retaining all the size and much strength, and moving heavy weights without the constant logging which stiffens the tendons and joints of the blooded trotting race of animals so generally used on the land in America. A great many of the finest carriage horses used by the nobility in England have one-third of this cart horse blood in them, for many farmers put cart mares to a thoroughbred stallion.—Country Gentleman.

When the fermentation of manure has been properly managed, and all the requisite precaution taken to prevent the dissipation of its ammoniacal salts, there is great advantage attending it, that besides attending immediate action, a manure is produced of greater value but of smaller bulk and less weight. A manure heap sometimes loses half its bulk and one-third of its weight by fermentation, a circumstance which occasions an important saving in carriage.

The Culture of Trees.—The recent report of the U. S. Agricultural Department contains a valuable essay, contributed by J. M. Edman, late Commissioner of the Land Office. Great efforts will be made to the country, it is predicted, unless the size of the woodland be restrained. It is asserted that, except in the mountain regions, nearly the entire surface from the Atlantic to the Mississippi has been despoiled of its primitive forest growth. Three-fourths of the original store of timber, it is believed, have already been consumed. The timberless surface of the plains between the Mississippi and Pacific amounts to fourteen hundred square miles, and it is asserted that by a little artificial effort, forests may be gradually extended over this large area. Experiments thus far made have proved successful. Trees to the number of millions have been produced from the seed of almost every forest species by the unaided efforts of a single season in Nebraska.

Sheep.—Have an eye to evidence of parasites, and apply a strong solution of carbolic soap, through into the parted wool, on the parts most affected, from a bottle having a quill through the cork.

Moving for a new trial.—Continuing second visit.
