Agricultural.

To Pea or Not to Pea.

The question of whether it pays to raise a good deal of attention to it. It is, as a rule, a very sure crop, over-compensating a moderate outlay for it. In localities and soils favorable to the latter, but on some soils and in some localities the crop will yield much the heaviest and most valuable crop. And this is the case on soils which are incapable of bearing a full crop of corn. There is, however, one drawback to the culture of the pea which gives corn a great advantage over it. We cannot manure peas to the same extent as corn. If we manure peas too heavily, they are apt to run to straw, and the proportion of grain is diminished; while, on the other hand, so long as we give proper attention to corn, we cannot manure too highly, as every extra pound of manure will tell in an increased crop. But if we happen to have a piece of land for which we have not a sufficient supply of manure, it will pay much better to put in a crop of peas than a crop of corn.

A well-cultivated crop of corn or roots leaves the land in better condition than a crop of peas—but unless the corn or roots were well cared for, the contrary will be the case. A crop of peas, even if left to itself, will leave the land in tolerably good condition, as the field-pea proper, from its dense foliage and vigorous growth, smothers most weeds, although there are some (Canada thistle and couch-grass for example) upon which a crop of peas has very little effect. It often happens that when the farmer is not able to enrich his land sufficiently, the corn crop hardly pays the expense of cultivation. In such cases, by adopting peas, we can dispense with much labor and yet secure a paying crop.

We do not intend by this to recommend a slovenly habit in the culture of peas. We only say that when the farmer is unable to command full supply of manure and labor, peas will pay better than corn.

The real value of the pea as an article of food is difficult to determine, and its fattening power has been variously estimated. Two bushels of peas are counted equal to three of corn, while others do not hesitate to assign to them a much higher proportional value.

In making any practical trials to determine this question, we must remember that the pea as compared with corn, is easily soaked and easily digested. Feed one cow four bushels of whole peas, and another twenty bushels of whole and dry corn, and it would not surprise us if the peas proved superior to the corn. But we must remember that two thirds of the corn may pass from the animal in a perfectly uninjured state, especially if her teeth and other digestive organs are not in first-rate order. The peas being more easily digested, less loss would be incurred, and consequently greater effects would be produced. If now we grind both the corn and peas, some of this great disparity will disappear, from the simple fact that a proportionally greater quantity of the corn will be digested. Finally, let us cook the corn-meal very thoroughly, and also the peas. We will now find that while the peas do not gain greatly by this operation, the effects of the corn are wonderfully increased, and if the corn be finely ground and very thoroughly cooked, we are inclined to believe that it will not prove very much inferior to its competitor. In all this we have not lost sight of the chemical constitution of the two grains. We know that while the corn contains but ten per cent of nitrogen, the peas contain twenty-two and a half per cent. We doubt very much, however, if practice, this advantage is as great as it seems. Practically, buckwheat has been found to be a most exellent food for fattening poultry, and yet contains but nine per cent of nitrogen. We have no doubt that if the percentage of nitrogen in corn and buckwheat could be increased, their value would be increased, too, but we are fully convinced that in peas the extreme useful proportion of nitrogen has been passed, and that the benefit arising from the presence of over fifteen per cent of nitrogen in any food is found only in the increased value of the manure. Now, we have always held that it is very poor economy to waste at the feed-trough in the hope of saving in the manure heap. The true economy, therefore, would be to mix these two articles of food in proper proportions, and we would get all the advantage arising from the carbon of the corn and the nitrogen of the peas. It has been said that wheat is a good type food as regards composition. If we accept this statement, then, as wheat contains thirteen per cent of nitrogen, corn ten per cent, and peas twenty-two and a half per cent, we can, by adding twenty-five pounds of peas to seventy-five pounds of corn, produce a food containing the same percentage of nitrogen that exists in wheat And this we believe to be the most economical method of using peas.

It may sometimes happen that the great difference between corn and peas, as regards their digestibility, may be sufficient to determine which we shall select. Every housewife knows that it is very difficult to cook corn-meal thoroughly. It requires not only boiling, but long-continued soaking. Peas, on the other hand, do not even require to be ground. Soak them in water, and they will swell up and became quite digestible, while if they be boiled they fall down into a paste without any grinding. If, therefore, we wish to dispense with the grinding of our grain, we will find peas suited to our purpose.

Another point to be taken into consideration, in estimating the value of a crop of peas, is the amount which may be expected per acre. The pea crop varies in its results from ten to sixty-two bushels. Mr. Harton estimates a fair average crop at a little over thirty bushels. But we must remember that the land which would yield thirty bushels of peas would probably not yield thirty bushels of shelled corn.

The straw or haulm of the pea is probably of about the same value as the fodder from an equal area of corn (?) It is a little difficult to cure, but if cut before it is too ripe, dried as thoroughly and rapidly as possible, and well salted when it is carried into the mow, it will keep without danger of moulding. Pea straw is about the only article of fodder which is salted by any of the old county farmers.

It is our impression that it will pay every farmer to raise at least two or three acres of peas if for no other purpose than to improve the quality of his other feed. We have seen a slight admixture of peas with food produce very marked effects upon the of farm stock, particularly the working horses.—Rural and Home.
