The Esquire thinking—if he took time to think at all—that perhaps it was Freezian's ghost, retreated in double-quick time. But Green soon relieved him of his fears by telling him to come in—that Freezian was dead and could not hurt him. The old Esquire came in and said, "Why, Green, were you not afeard, lying here with a dead man?" Green's reply was, "I never feared a live man"—suggesting, of course, that there was no cause to fear a dead man.
